PREFACE

TO THE SIXTH EDITION.

IN preparing this edition it has been found necessary to make extensive alterations and additions. Mr. Jarman based his division of the subject on the law of devises, and his scheme of arrangement provided no place for some important topics connected with wills of personalty. Several new chapters have therefore been added, and some of the old chapters have been re-arranged. Mr. Sanger is primarily responsible for the new chapters dealing with Legacies, Annuities, Ademption and Satisfaction, Absolute Interests in Personalty, and Life Estates and Interests; and for the section on Gifts Over in Chapter XXXVI. He has also undertaken the task of revising several of the chapters in the second volume (Chapters XLVII.—LII., LV., LVII. and LVIII. in this edition) which it was necessary to abridge in order to provide space for the new matter. The chapter on Conversion has been re-arranged; Powers of Appointment have been made the subject of a separate chapter; the chapter on Description of Persons and Things includes (in addition to some new matter) matter which in previous editions was scattered through several chapters; and new chapters have been added dealing with Gifts by Reference, Alternative and Substitutional Gifts, and Trusts. It will be noticed that in several chapters (including Chapters IV., VI., VIII., XVI., XVII., XXV., XXIX., XXXVII., XXXIX., XLIII. and LIV.), new sections have been added for the purpose of dealing with various questions not referred to in previous editions.

Owing to the large number of recent decisions on the Rule against Perpetuities it has been made the subject of a separate chapter, and some new sections have been added with the view of bringing out the distinction between (i) "perpetuity" in the sense of an inalienable interest, (ii) "perpetuity" in the old-fashioned sense of an unbarrable entail, and (iii) those future interests in property which are void for remoteness under the modern Rule against Perpetuities. These distinctions are not without practical importance, for a charitable bequest may be void for remoteness although it can never be void as a "perpetuity" (see p. 367); and the better opinion is (although the law is at present settled otherwise) that a restraint on anticipation, being an exception to the rule forbidding the creation of inalienable interests, is never void on the ground of "perpetuity," and is only void on the ground of remoteness if it is annexed to an interest which is itself void for remoteness (see p. 305 n.). Another instance of the confusion which has been produced by a failure to distinguish between "perpetuity" (in the sense of an inalienable interest) and "remoteness," is to be found in the decision (since overruled) in Birmingham Canal Co. v. Cartwright (11 Ch. D. 562). In the present edition the rule in Whitby v. Mitchell is treated as derived from the old Rule against Perpetuities; this is in accordance with the opinion of Mr. Fearne and the Real Property Commissioners. The opinion of some eminent writers (including Mr. Charles Butler and Mr. Joshua Williams) that it is derived from the so-called doctrine of double possibilities, has, it is to be hoped, received its quietus from the decision in Re Nash (see Addenda, p. cccv.). The opinion of Mr. Fearne and the Real Property Commissioners has also been followed with regard to the doctrine of cy-près, and it is therefore treated as an exception to the old Rule against Perpetuities. Mr. Lewis and Mr. Gray consider it to be an exception to the modern Rule against Perpetuities, but this mode of treatment (which makes the doctrine of cy-près an unintelligible anomaly) is due to the refusal of those learned writers to recognize the existence of the old Rule against Perpetuities.

Some difficulty has been felt in dealing with the question whether the modern Rule against Perpetuities applies to contingent remainders, owing partly to Mr. Jarman's undecided views on the subject, and partly to some recent decisions. Mr. Jarman's attitude is not difficult to account for. Long before he wrote, the landowners had been decisively beaten in their protracted struggle with the courts, and had abandoned all attempts to create perpetual settlements of land, in the nature of unbarrable entails, by limiting the land to their unborn descendants, as purchasers, in succession, and similar devices. The rule forbidding these settlements, or "perpetuities" as they were formerly called, had become so firmly established by the middle of the eighteenth century that it was seldom referred to, except as a rule which conveyancers were bound to observe in framing strict settlements of land: so it gradually came to be stated in the form in which we now know it—the rule in Whitby v. Mitchell—and its true origin was forgotten. In the meantime, however, the courts had found it necessary to invent a new rule, to check the creation of future interests, either in real or in personal property, by executory devises and bequests, trusts, and other methods unknown to the ancient common law; this new rule was framed by analogy to the old Rule against Perpetuities (which made it impossible to tie up land longer than a life in being and the minority of an unborn person), and when the old rule retired from active service, the new rule became known as the Rule against Perpetuities. Mr. Jarman was much puzzled by the ambiguity of the word "perpetuity," and was unable to make up his mind whether the rule in Whitby v. Mitchell (as we now call it) was distinct from the modern Rule against Perpetuities, or whether the two rules were identical. His doubts were not unnatural, for he had made no special study of the subject. His contemporary, Mr. Lewis, had not this excuse, for his work on the Rule against Perpetuities is a book displaying extraordinary industry and learning, but he thought it so important that there should be only one Rule against Perpetuities, of universal application, that he entirely misunderstood the nature of the old rule forbidding the creation of "perpetuities" in the obsolete sense of the term, and boldly maintained that "perpetuity" meant the same thing in 1716 as it did in 1843. His misapprehension was similar to that of the playgoer who came away from a performance of Shakespeare's King Henry V. with the firm belief that lawn-tennis was played in the fifteenth century. Having started wrongly, Mr. Lewis fell into further error: he denied that the rule which we call the rule in Whitby v. Mitchell ever existed as an independent rule; and when he found, in Mr. Fearne's well-known work, the statement that a contingent remainder which tends to a perpetuity is void, he thought that this referred to the modern Rule against Perpetuities, and was thus led to the erroneous conclusion that contingent remainders are subject to that rule. Mr. Lewis's double mistake was pointed out by Mr. Joshua Williams, a writer of far greater historical learning and acumen than Mr. Lewis, more than sixty years ago; nevertheless, Mr. Lewis's views on the question of contingent remainders have been accepted as accurate, during the last few years, by several judges of first instance. The result is that the law is in a state of confusion and uncertainty. The Court of Appeal, in Whitby v. Mitchell, followed Mr. Joshua Williams unreservedly, so far as was necessary for the decision of that case; it remains to be seen whether their successors, when the question comes before them, will follow him the rest of the way, and overrule Re Frost and the dicta in Re Ashforth.* The older authorities, on which Mr. Joshua Williams based his opinion, do not seem to have been referred to in those cases, and they have therefore been collected in Chapter X. (pp. 369-370).

Another illustration of the truth of Lord Coke's saying, ignoratis terminis ignoratur et ars, is to be found in the doctrine of domicile, in connection with the rules governing testate and intestate succession. When questions caused by the conflict of laws on this point first began to arise, our judges had recourse to the Roman law for illumination. Unfortunately they do not seem to have fully grasped the technical meaning of domicilium in Roman law, or the all-important distinction between domicilium and origo, or the reasons which made domicilium of practical importance in Roman law; the Roman empire, during the time of the great juriconsults, embraced the whole of the civilized world, and therefore no conflict of laws, in our sense of the term, was possible. If our judges had paid more attention to these matters, they might possibly have come to the conclusion that the doctrines of the Roman law threw no light on the problem which they had to consider, and that in case of conflict between the laws of two independent states with reference to the succession to a man's personal property after his death, the question ought to be governed by the law of his nationality, and not by that of his domicil. This rule would harmonize with the assumption which is made by most Englishmen when they go to live in a foreign country without any idea of abandoning their nationality, and if it had been adopted as a principle of English law the Privy Council would have been in a position to decide the case of Bremer v. Freeman (see p. 11) in accordance with the dictates of common sense. The adoption of the principle would have had other minor advantages: we should have been spared the lengthy and irrelevant citations from the civilians which encumber the pages of our reports; and the doctrine of Renvoi would have lost half its terrors.

* It is respectfully submitted that the actual decision in Re Ashforth is correct, as the ultimate limitation was an executory devise and not a contingent remainder. The first ground given for the decision in Re Frost is erroneous: see Re Nash, [1910] 1 Ch. 1; the second ground is also erroneous, being based on the same singular misapprehension of Mr. Fearne's meaning as that made by Mr. Lewis.

The Editors have ventured to comment on some modern cases which seem to be not altogether consistent with first principles: such as In bonis Gentry (p. 170), Burton v. Newbery (p. 200), Re Tyler (p. 212), Wallis v. Sol.-Gen. for New Zealand (p. 245), Re Dean (p. 297), Re Lord Chesham's Settlement (p. 697), Re Waterhouse (p. 805), Re Oliver's Settlement (p. 851), Bouch v. Sproule (p. 1223), Re Hubbuck (p. 1241). The case of Re Waidanis is referred to on p. 935, and Leach v. Jay on p. 950.

In previous editions of this work, an attempt was made to distinguish the editors' additions by enclosing them in square brackets, but the attempt was not altogether successful, for in many cases alterations were made in such a way as to convey an erroneous impression of Mr. Jarman's meaning. This mode of distinguishing Mr. Jarman's text has not been employed in the present edition, except in Chapters XLVIII., XLIX. and LI. ; in the other chapters Mr. Jarman's text is distinguished by quotation marks, and care has been taken to reprint it, without alteration, from the first edition. The Editors think that Mr. Jarman's original language should be preserved as far as possible in all cases where his statements of principle have, so to speak, become classical, and also where he expressed an opinion on points which are still contested or doubtful.

Owing to various unforeseen causes, the work has taken a long time in passing through the press, and the addenda are correspondingly numerous. The reader is requested to note them up in the body of the book.

Mr. Sydney Edward Williams, of Lincolns Inn, is responsible for the index, and Mr. Lawrence Duckworth, of the Middle Temple, is responsible for the table of cases.

PREFACE

TO THE FIRST EDITION.

SIXTEEN years have now elapsed since the writer diffidently presented to the profession his first publication on Testamentary Law, in the form of an edition of Powell on Devises, with a supplementary treatise on the Construction of Devises. The reception given to this work was such as abundantly to compensate for the severe labour which it exacted, and under which the health of its Editor more than once sank. This was followed, after the interval of a few years, by the Tenth Volume of the Precedents in Conveyancing, being the portion of that work which was devoted to the same subject. The materials afforded by these publications have been freely used in the present work ; but considering the very large accessions since made to the adjudications on testamentary law, and that it has not escaped the activity of modern legislation, it will be obvious that many of the various subjects embraced by so extensive a range of disquisition, now present themselves under a different aspect, requiring, not only very large additions to the matter which composed the former works, but the rejection of no inconsiderable portion of that matter ; and the Writer is not ashamed to avow, that another, though certainly a less extensive, head of alteration arises from the changes which experience has wrought in some of the opinions of his earlier days. The result is, that probably more than one-half of the present treatise is entirely original ; and the writer therefore feels that he has to subject his performance (as partially new) to the criticism of his professional brethren, whose kind consideration he again bespeaks, convinced that those who are the most competent to detect error, will be the most generous and indulgent in the appreciation of the difficulties which beset the inquirer into the principles of one of the most intricate branches of the law. To those difficulties have been added the daily interruptions of professional avocation, which have long delayed, and have sometimes threatened wholly to prevent, the present publication. The recent act has created some additional embarrassment to a writer on Wills, by introducing new principles of construction, partial in their application; for, by drawing a line between wills of an earlier and those of a later date, the legislature has diminished the importance, without permitting the rejection or the neglect, of the old law. On these subjects, conciseness and compression have been specially aimed at, and some additional labour has been willingly incurred, in order to avoid incumbering the present work unnecessarily with matter, which every passing day tends to render less practically useful.

- „ 2, n. (l). Add: “ See Re Earl of Caithness, 7 T. L. R. 354.”
- „ 3. After the last paragraph, add: “ If a testator, domiciled in England, devises immoveable property situate abroad to trustees in England upon trust for sale, and a beneficiary dies while the property is still unsold, his interest is liable to the English death duties: Att.-Gen. v. Johnson, [1907] 2 K. B. 885.”
- „ 11, n. (g). Add: “ The statement is, of course, only true so far as the will attempts to dispose of moveable property (ante, p. 1.)”
- „ 12, n. (w). In Lyne v. De la Ferté, 102 L. T. 143, a testamentary instrument which, being wrongly dated, was prima facie invalid under French law, was admitted to probate under Lord Kingsdown's Act, the defect being remediable under French law.

P. 21st ed., p. 527; P. P. 16th ed., p. 491). As to paraphernalia, see post, p. 2028.”
- „ 72. The reader may notice that both spellings, pur auter vie, and pur autre vie, occur in the text. Mr. Jarman used the latter spelling. It is a small matter, but the editor prefers pur auter vie; it is the spelling of Littleton, Coke and Blackstone, and seems to be historically correct. Pur auter vie means “ for the life of another man,” not “ for other life,” just as en auter droit means “ in right of another person,” not “ in other right.” Auter appears to be a corrupt form of autrui, which, Professor Maitland tells us, was the correct word for “ another person ” in the fourteenth century, as it is in modern French (Introduction to the Year Books published by the Selden Society, p. xlix). Professor Maitland seems to have felt a doubt as to the meaning of the phrases en auter droit and pur auter vie which it is difficult to share, having regard to the way in which Littleton and Coke render them.
- „ 74-5. Mr. Theobald (Wills, 7th ed. p. 523) seems to dissent from Mr. Jarman's view as to the devisability of a quasi-entail. Mr. Hayes, however, was of the same opinion as Mr. Jarman (Conv. i. 198).

- "287, n. (h). Since this note was written an article by the present editor has been published in the Law Quarterly Review for October, 1909, in which an attempt is made to explain the origin of the theory that the rule in *Whitby v. A. in Re Nash, [1910] 1 Ch. 1 (supra) that the rule in Whitby v. Mitchell is not derived from the so-called doctrine of double possibilities.

If the trust for payment of debts is preceded by or mixed up with other trusts, so that the amount applicable for payment of debts depends on the operation of trusts which are themselves too remote, as in *Scarisbrick v. „ 698, n. (f). After the note on Re Lord Chesham's Settlement was in type, a short paragraph appeared in the Law Magazine and Review for November, 1909, stating that during the argument of the appeal, Farwell, L.J., drew attention to the fact that “the very same point on the very same settlement had been decided in the very same way by Chitty, J., some twenty years ago (In re Lord Chesham).” This is not quite accurate: the settlement was the same, but the circumstances and the point were different. When the settlement came before Chitty, J., in 1886, the third Baron Chesham was living, and he was tenant for life of the chattels; he was also residuary legatee under the will of the second Baron, and the question was whether he could, under the doctrine of election, be required to compensate the persons to whom the testator had purported to bequeath the chattels; Chitty, J., held that they could not be removed from the mansion house without a breach of trust, and that the tenant for life, therefore, had no assignable interest in them. It is difficult to see how the learned judge could have decided otherwise. When the matter came before the Court of Appeal, the third Baron and his eldest son were both dead, and there was no tenant for life of the chattels; the question was whether the chattels had vested absolutely in the eldest son of

- the third Baron on his attaining twenty-one in his father's lifetime. The decision of Chitty J., had no bearing on this point, and even if it had, it would not have enabled the Court of Appeal to disregard the artificial rule of construction laid down by the House of Lords in Foley v. Burnell. See Re Parker, [1910] 1 Ch. 581.

- „ 1110. At the end of the second paragraph, add: "In Re White, 101 L. T. 780 (stated shortly ante, p. 1106, n. (r)), Joyce, J., distinguished Laundy v. Williams, 2 P. W. 478, which he said was a case of general legacies, and held that in the case before him the bequest of £1000 was a portion of the particular residue, from which it would seem that if a legacy of £1000 is given to A.

for life and after his death to B., and A. dies within a short time after the testator, B. is only entitled to interest from a year after the testator's death. This is clearly right on principle. It is, however, not quite clear how such a case differs from the case of Re White. The learned judge seems to have relied on Re Waters, 42 Ch. D. 517, but the question in that case was quite different, ante, p. 1109 n. (l)."

These cases are referred to with reference to the admissibility of parol evidence, ante, pp. 503 seq.

"It should be added that the manner in which a will is framed sometimes affords ground for deciding whether the testator had in his mind existing persons, or whether he intended to make a general scheme for the distribution - of his property, to take effect according to the state of facts at his death : in the former case evidence of the state of facts at the date of the will is generally of importance in arriving at the testator's intention (ante. p. 503), while in the latter it is not. In Daubeny v. Coghlan (12 Sim. 507), the testator gave a legacy to the children of his niece Catherine A. and of his nephew, the late James C. ; he had had two nephews named James C., both of whom had long been dead, leaving no issue : he had only one nephew of the name of C. who had died leaving issue, namely Henry C. ; the children of Henry C. claimed the legacy ; on the face of the will it would seem clear that the testator had in mind existing persons, in which case the principle of Camoy's v. Blundell (post, p. 1264) would have applied, and the children of Henry C. would have been entitled, but the evidence was unsatisfactory, and the case was sent back for further inquiry."

BY WHAT LOCAL LAW WILLS ARE REGULATED.

I.—Distinction between Immoveable and Moveable Property.

Mr. Jarman states the general rule thus (a): “A will of fixed or immoveable property is generally governed by the lex loci rei sitæ; and hence, the place where such a will happens to be made and the language in which it is written, are wholly unimportant, as affecting both its construction and the ceremonial of its execution; the locality of the devised property is alone to be considered. Thus, a will made in Holland and written in Dutch must, in order to operate on lands in England, contain expressions which, being translated into our language, would comprise and destine the lands in question, and must be executed and attested in precisely the same manner as if the will were made in England (b). And, of course, lands in England belonging to a British subject domiciled abroad, who dies intestate, descend according to the English law” (c).

sitæ*.

(a) First edition, p. 1. It is hardly necessary to point out that the rule only applies so far as the will attempts to dispose of immoveable property; so far as it disposes of personal property, its operation and construction depend on a different rule: infra, p. 4.

(b) Bovey v. Smith, 1 Vern. 85. See also Bowaman v. Reeve, Pre. Ch. 577; Drummond v. Drummond, 6 Br. P. C. Toml. 601; Coppin v. Coppin, 2 P. W.

291; Brodie v. Barry, 2 V. & B. 131. To arrive at the intention of such a will, the technical terms of foreign law will be read in the sense which that law gives them, and will operate accordingly so far as the lex loci permits: Studd v. Cook, 8 A. C. 577; Re Harman, [1894] 3 Ch. 607.

(c) See Doe d. Birtwhistle v. Vardill, 5 B. & Cr. 438; Birtwhistle v. Vardill, 7 Cl. & F. 895, where it was held that a

Leaseholds
lex loci.

The same principle applies to a will made in exercise of a power to appoint immoveable property (d).

A disposition of immoveable property situate in England which is invalid by the law of England, is not made valid by the fact that it is permitted by the law of the testator's domicile. Thus, the invalidity of a devise of English realty under the Mortmain Acts is not affected by the testator's domicile (e).

Conversely, land situate abroad is subject to the local law, and any disposition of it by the will of a domiciled Englishman is subject to that law (f).

If a testator, domiciled abroad, makes a will by which real estate situate in England is vested in his executors, it is subject to the law of administration (as regards payment of debts, annuities, &c.) which prevails in the country of his domicile (g).

It will, of course, be remembered that so far as questions of domicile and locality are concerned, Scotland, Ireland and the British Colonies are foreign countries (h).

Leaseholds for years are for many purposes included under the denomination of immoveable property (i), so as to be governed by the lex loci and not by the lex domicilii. Thus, if a testator, domiciled abroad, disposes of leaseholds situate in England upon trusts which contravene the provisions of the Thellusson Act, these trusts are void (j). So if a person who owns leaseholds in England is domiciled abroad, the beneficial interest in them does not pass by his will unless it is executed in accordance with the requirements of the Wills Act (k). Conversely, if the will is executed in accordance with English law, but not in accordance with the law of the domicile, it is valid as to the testator's English leaseholds, although it may be invalid as to the remainder of his personal estate (l). And if child who was legitimate by the law of his parents' domicile, but illegitimate according to English law, could not take land in England by descent. As to land in Italy, see Earl Nelson v. Earl Bridport, 8 Bea. 547. Our Courts will not entertain disputes regarding the devolution of title to immoveable property situate in a foreign country: Re Hawthorne, 23 Ch. D. 743. CHAPTER I.

a person domiciled in England bequeaths his residuary personality to persons in succession, leaseholds situate abroad forming part of the residue are subject to the lex loci, and if by that law the tenant for life is entitled to enjoy them in specie, they ought not to be converted under the rule in Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth (m).

But leaseholds are "personal estate" within the meaning of Lord Kingsdown's Act, subject, of course, to the general principle recognised in Freke v. Lord Carbery (n).

Lord Kingsdown's Act.

Estates pur auter vie are realty (o), and are, therefore, presumably immoveable property within the meaning of the rule now under discussion.

Estates pur auter vie.

Money representing the proceeds of sale of land in England, sold by order of the Court under the Partition Acts, is considered as real estate (p). Whether money subject to a trust for investment in land, or land subject to a trust for sale, is immoveable property within the meaning of the rule, does not seem to have been decided (q). Where the testator has an absolute power of disposition, so that he can alter the nature of the property, it would seem, on principle, that if he directs land to be turned into money, he can dispose of the money in any manner authorised by the law of his domicile (r).

Doctrine of conversion.

In Freke v. Lord Carbery (s), however, where a testator domiciled in Ireland bequeathed English leaseholds to trustees upon trust for sale and investment, and directed the investments to be held upon trust to accumulate the income for a period in excess of that allowed by the Thellusson Act, it was held by Lord Selborne that the act applied, and that the trust for accumulation was therefore partly invalid. Sed quære (t).

(p) Grimwood v. Bartels, 46 L. J. Ch. 788. See Re Hawthorne, 23 Ch. D. 743.

(q) It was held in Murray v. Champenowne, [1901] 2 Ir. R. 232, that a power to appoint the proceeds of land settled upon trust for sale but not yet sold, was properly exercised by a will valid in accordance with the lex loci, although invalid according to the law of the testator's domicile.

(r) Re Piercy, [1895] 1 Ch. 83; Re Harman, [1894] 3 Ch. 607. See Gillies v. Longlands, 4 De G. & S. 372; Chand- ler v. Pocock, 15 Ch. D. 491, 16 Ch. D. 648, and the other cases cited in the chapter on Powers.

(t) It does not appear whether the decision turned on the fact that, although the testator was domiciled in Ireland, the trust was (as appears to have been the case) one to be administered according to English law (see Cookney v. Anderson, 31 Bea. 452; Ewing v. Orr-Ewing, 10 App. Ca. 453, and other cases cited in Lewin on Trusts, 11th edition, p. 49). On the question by what law a testamentary disposition of property is governed, it is submitted that the true principle is to be found in the following note, added in the third edition of this work (p. 4), by Messrs. Wolstenholme and Vincent :

CHAPTER I.

Trust to
land.

It follows from the principle above stated, that if a testator bequeaths personal estate to trustees upon trust to invest it in the purchase of land in a foreign country, to be settled to limitations permitted by the law of that country, the fact that they are illegal by the law of England is immaterial (u).

Conversely, if a testator domiciled abroad bequeaths money to an English corporation, to be laid out in the purchase of land in England, the validity of the bequest is not affected by the fact that such a bequest would have been illegal according to the law of England (v).

Choses in action are an anomalous description of property. For some purposes they have a locality and for others they have not (w). So far as the law of wills is concerned, questions with regard to choses in action arise chiefly in connection with gifts of property in a particular place (x), and with reference to the administration of assets (y). The rules with regard to appointments under powers also appear to be based on the principle that a trust fund has a locality, and that a testamentary appointment is therefore not necessarily governed by the law of the testator's domicile (z).

The general rule, as stated by Mr. Jarman (a), is that "in regard to personal, or rather moveable property, the lex domicilii prevails (b).

"It is said (11 Jarm. Byth. Conv. 3rd ed., by Sweet, p. 15) that the lex loci must determine what part is real and what part personal; and that then the lex domicilii comes in and determines the distribution of that part of the property which the lex loci has determined to be personal. See also Deane on the Law of Wills, p. 15, citing Price v. Dewhurst, 4 My. & Cr. 81; Hayes & Jarm. Conc. Forms of Wills, 4th ed. p. 2, 5th ed. p. 25. The case of Jerningham v. Herbert, 4 Russ. 388, is in point on the same side; as also is a dictum of Sir J. Stuart in Pearmain v. Twiss, 2 Giff. 136." This note was cited in Freke v. Lord Carbery.

(v) Canterbury (Mayor, &c., of) v. Wyburn, [1895] A. C. 89. It appears that if the testator had paid the money to the corporation in his lifetime, they could have complied with the condition.

(z) See Chap. XXIII., and post, p. 9.

(a) First edition, p. 2. It should be remembered that such expressions as "the lex domicilii" or "the law of England" are ambiguous; the question (which does not properly fall within the scope of this work) is discussed in Dicey, Conf. of Laws, 79. It is hardly necessary to say that in Roman law lex domicilii had not the meaning which we attribute to it: see Savigny, System, viii. § 356.

(b) Preston v. Melville, 8 Cl. & F. 1. In Lynch v. Provisional Government of Paraguay, L. R., 2 P. & D. 268, it was held that a change in the law of the domicile, in the nature of a privilege, made after the death of the testator, did not affect the jurisdiction of the English Court of Probate.

If, therefore, a foreigner dies domiciled in England, his personal property, in case he were intestate, will be distributed according to the English law of succession (c); and any will which he may have left, whether made in his native or in his adopted country, or elsewhere, must be construed according to the law of England (d); and it is scarcely necessary to observe, that stock in the public funds is undistinguishable in this respect from other personal property (e). And the moveable property of such a person which is out of England at the time of his death, will also, it seems, generally speaking, follow the domicile; but this, of course, depends on the laws of the state in which the property is situate, which may not (though the codes of many civilised states do (f)) accord with our own in this particular. Sometimes, however, a difficulty occurs in the application of the principle, from the fact that the foreign state, though it recognises the general doctrine, yet imposes restrictions on the testamentary power unknown to the law of the adopted country, and from which it may not permit its citizens to escape, in regard to property within its jurisdiction, by a mere change of domicile. For instance, the French law does not, like our own, permit a man to bequeath his entire property away from his wife and children (g). Now, if a Frenchman dies domiciled in England, is it quite clear that his moveable property in France would be subject to British law, so as to pass by such a will? In such cases the Code Napoleon seems to draw a distinction between the acquisition of a foreign domicile by mere residence,

(c) Thorne v. Watkins, 2 Ves. sen. 35; Bempde v. Johnstone, 3 Ves. 198; Balfour v. Scott, 6 Br. P. C. 550. As to the question whether the next of kin of a foreigner domiciled in England can include persons who would be illegitimate by English law, see Re Goodman's Trusts, 17 Ch. D. 266; Re Grove, 40 Ch. D. 216, and other cases cited in Chap. XLIII.

(d) Anstruther v. Chalmers, 2 Sim. 1; Price v. Dewhurst, 8 Sim. 299, 4 My. & Cr. 76; Spratt v. Harris, 4 Hagg. 405; Reynolds v. Kortwright, 18 Bea. 417. As to Boyes v. Bedale, 1 H. & M. 798, see Chap. XLIII.

(e) Re Ewin, 1 Cr. & J. 151. In this case the question was as to the liability of property to legacy duty, the discussion of which sometimes indirectly involves points as to domicile, alienage, &c. In previous editions of this work the effect of domicile on questions of legacy, probate, and succession duty was treated of at some length, but as these questions do not belong to the subject of this treatise, and would demand considerable space for their adequate discussion, the notes have been omitted in this edition.

(f) See Price v. Dewhurst, 4 My. & Cr. 83. Mr. Jarman seems to have been under a misapprehension on this point: many foreign countries treat nationality, and not domicile, as determining the law of succession and testamentary disposition; for example, the law of France (Re Trufort, 36 Ch. D. 600), the law of Belgium (Collier v. Rivaz, 2 Curt. 855), the Italian code (Dicey, 721), and the law of Baden (Re Johnson, [1903] 1 Ch. 821). The law of Portugal seems to agree with that of England in this respect: see Doglioni v. Crispin, L. R., 1 H. L. 301.

CHAPTER I.

Extent of rule.

and some other more decided acts of self-expatriation, such as that of becoming the naturalised subject of another state" (h).

Law of foreign domicile.

The general rule governs questions as to the validity of the will, with regard to the testamentary capacity of the testator (i), the bequeathable quality of the property bequeathed by it (j), and the formalities with which it was executed (k), as well as its construction (l).

The testamentary capacity of a foreign subject domiciled in England may be affected by a contract or other act entered into by him according to the law of his native country. Thus in De Nicols v. Curlier (m), two French subjects married in France subject to the law of community of goods; they came to England and acquired an English domicile; the husband died, having made an English will disposing of all his property: it was held that as to his moveables the rights of the wife were not affected by the change of domicile, and that she was entitled to the same share as she would have been entitled to if they had remained domiciled in France.

Foreign domicile.

The general principle above stated applies in the case of a foreign domicile. If, therefore, any person, whether a British subject or a foreigner, dies while domiciled abroad, the law of the place which at his death constituted his home will regulate the distribution of his moveable (n) property in England, in case of intestacy (o), i.e., should he happen to have left no instrument which, according to the law of his adopted country, would amount to a testamentary disposition of such property (p); and if he left a will, the same law will determine its validity with reference to the formalities of (n) Since the rule mobilia sequuntur personam is inapplicable to leaseholds

(see ante, p. 2), it follows (subject to the Wills Act, 1861, s. 2, presently stated, and which speaks of "personal" estate) that to dispose of leaseholds a will must be executed according to 1 Vict. c. 26, and that the will of a domiciled foreigner not so executed, though it may be proved here, and will enable the executor to sell leaseholds (Hood v. Lord Barrington, L. R., 6 Eq. 218), will not operate on the beneficial interest; the title of the executor is from the probate: the beneficial interest devolves as undisposed of: Pepin v. Bruyère, [1900] 2 Ch. 504, [1902] 1 Ch. 24.

its execution (q), the personal competence of the testator (r) and the efficacy of his testamentary dispositions (s), and will also regulate their construction (t).

CHAPTER I.

An English Court will, therefore, not grant probate of such a will (except in cases within the provisions of the Wills Act, 1861 (u)) unless it appear to be an effectual testamentary instrument according to the law of the domicile. And, by parity of reasoning, the English Court will grant probate of an instrument ascertained to be testamentary according to the law of the foreign domicile, though invalid and incapable of operation as an English will. Thus (v), probate was granted of the will of a married lady, who at the time of her death was domiciled in Spain (of which country she was, it seems, also a native), on its being shown that by the Spanish law a feme covert may, under certain limitations, dispose of her property by will as a feme sole.

Probate of foreign will.

And it is the constant practice of the Court of Probate, in its discretion (w), to grant ancillary probate or letters of administration cum testamento annexo of wills of testators domiciled in foreign countries, which have been previously proved there, without inquiring or permitting inquiry into the grounds of the foreign proceeding, though the bulk of the property of the deceased testator should happen to be in England (x). If no foreign grant has been made, the English Court of Probate will make a grant to the person entitled to it by the law of the domicile (y).

CHAPTER I.

But some foreign states disregard domicile altogether, and treat the devolution of the property of a deceased person as governed by the law of his nationality. It has been decided that if a British subject makes his permanent home in such a country, the devolution of his property, in the event of his dying intestate, is governed by the law of his domicile of origin (z).

Effect where probate is granted in error.

Where probate has been granted of an instrument eventually ascertained not to be testamentary according to the law of the domicile, this proceeding (though it vests the whole personalty which is within the jurisdiction of the Court in the executor, as to whose legal title the grant of probate is conclusive) does not regulate or affect the ultimate destination of the property, which therefore the executor will be bound to distribute according to the law of the domicile (a).

Foreign law, how ascertained.

Where the construction of the will is to be regulated by foreign law, the opinion of an advocate versed in such law is obtained, for the information and guidance of the English Court on which devolves the task of construing it (b); or the English Court may remit a case for the opinion of a Court in any other part of the British dominions (c), or of a Court in any foreign country with granted in Ireland of the will of a domiciled Englishman, his assets being in Ireland.

(z) Re Johnson, [1903] 1 Ch. 821, post, p. 25. Suppose an Englishman died possessed of personal property situate in England, but domiciled in Italy, and possessed of personal property in that country, and having made a will admitted to probate there: it seems that in the Italian Courts his testamentary capacity would be governed by the law of England, and it is submitted that our Courts should follow the same rule, otherwise the singular result might be that the Italian Courts would give full effect to his testamentary dispositions in respect of his moveables in Italy, while the English Courts would give his wife and family the same rights in respect of his moveables in England which they would have had under the law of Italy if he had been an Italian subject. The question is discussed in Mr. Pawley Bate's Essay on the Doctrine of Renvoi, and in Mr. Dicey's Conflict of Laws; post, p. 25. As to restrictions imposed on testamentary capacity by the laws of foreign countries, see a Return presented to the House of Commons in 1908 (Miscellaneous, No. 7).

(a) Thornton v. Curling, 8 Sim. 310.

In this case, an Englishman went to reside in France, where he was domiciled at his death, and left a will providing for an illegitimate child and its mother, to the exclusion of his wife and legitimate child, which the French law does not permit. Donations by a Frenchman (whether testamentary, or by act inter vivos) must not exceed a moiety if he leave at his decease one legitimate child, a third if he leave two, and a fourth if he leave three or more; the descendants of a deceased child being considered as one. Moreover, a Frenchman cannot dispose of the whole of his property, if he leaves only ascendants.

which there is a convention for that purpose (d). But if the point in dispute depend upon principles of construction common to both countries, the Court will adjudicate upon the question, according to its own view of the case, without having recourse to the assistance of a foreign jurist (e). And if the witnesses refer to passages from the code of their country as containing the law applicable to the case, the Court will itself examine those passages, and consider what is their proper meaning (f).

By sect. 3 of Lord Kingsdown's Act (Wills Act, 1861), it is provided that no will or other testamentary instrument shall be held to be revoked or have become invalid, nor shall the construction thereof be altered, by reason of any subsequent change of domicile of the person making the same (g). This section applies to foreigners as well as to British subjects (h).

Validity and construction not affected by change of domicile.

The general rule that the law of the domicile applies to the moveable property of a deceased person, must be understood as meaning that it governs the devolution of the property. "For the purpose of succession and enjoyment, the law of the domicile governs the foreign personal assets. For the purpose of legal representation, of collection, and of administration, as distinguished from distribution among the successors, they [the assets] are governed not by the law of the owner's domicile, but by the law of their own locality" (i). This question is referred to in a later chapter (j).

Administration.

The general rule that a will, in order to be valid and operative with regard to the moveable property comprised in it, must comply with the law of the testator's domicile, is subject to an exception in the case of a will exercising a power of appointment. The question of the testator's capacity to exercise a power of appointment seems to depend on the intention of the parties creating the power; if it was intended that the property or trust fund should be governed by English law, the lex domicilii is immaterial (k). So with regard to the formalities of execution, if the will is executed in the particular form required by the power, it will, as a general rule, be good without reference to the law of the testator's domicil, because the appointee takes, not under the instrument exercising, but under the instrument creating, the power (l).

CHAPTER I.

treaty with

Another exception to the general rule exists where, by treaty between this country and the country of domicil, it is agreed that the English law shall prevail. Thus subjects of the Ottoman Empire cannot dispose of their property by will, but by treaty English subjects domiciled there are allowed to do so, and their wills must be executed according to the English law (m).

Construction.

The rule that a will is to be construed according to the law of the domicil, will yield to the expression of a contrary intention by the testator (n); but it seems that the use of the technical terms of the law of a foreign country, in the will of a testator having an English domicil, will not of itself be regarded as an indication of intention that the will is to be construed according to the foreign law (o).

This exception to the general rule is often of importance in the case of a will which exercises a power of appointment (p).

Incon-

The doctrine that the will of an Englishman is governed by the law of his domicil at the time of his death has always led to (k) See Chap. XXIII. (Powers), where Re Hernando, 27 Ch. D. 284; Re Mégret, [1901] 1 Ch. 547, and other cases, are referred to. With reference to the question by what law a settlement is intended to be governed, see Re Fitzgerald, [1904] 1 Ch. 573, where the principal authorities are cited.

(l) This subject is more fully dealt with in the chapter on Powers. See Tatnall v. Hankey, 2 Moo. P. C. C. 342; In bonis Alexander, 29 L. J. Pr. 93; In b. Hallyburton, L. E., 1 P. & D. 90. In the fourth and fifth editions of this work it is stated, on the authority of Story, Conf. c. viii.; 3 Burge, pt. 2, c. 20, that "the latter instrument [i.e. the instrument creating the power] is to be construed according to the law of the place where it is executed, if it deals with moveables, and according to the lex loci rei sitæ if with immoveables." As I have some doubt as to the correctness of this statement, I have removed it from the text [C. S.].

inconvenience. Mr. Jarman pointed out (g) that "a will may have been made in England, be written in the English language, the testator may have described himself as an Englishman (r), and it may have been proved in an English Court; and yet, after all, it may turn out, from the extrinsic fact of the maker being domiciled abroad at his death, that the will is wholly withdrawn from the influence of English jurisprudence."

In Bremer v. Freeman (s), the testatrix was an English subject resident in Paris, and executed a will conformably to English law; but probate of it was refused on the ground that she was domiciled in France, and that the will was not valid according to French law.

II.—Lord Kingsdown's Act.—To obviate such questions with regard to testators dying after August 6, 1861, it is enacted by the Wills Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 114), that (s. 1) every will and other testamentary instrument made out of the United Kingdom by a British subject (whatever may be the domicile of such person at the time of making the same, or at the time of his death) shall as regards personal estate be held to be well executed for the purpose of being admitted to probate, if the same be made according to the forms required either by the law of the place where the same was made, or by the law of the place where such person was domiciled when the same was made, or by the laws then in force in that part of her Majesty's dominions where he had his domicile of origin (t); and (s. 2) that every will and other testamentary instrument made within the United Kingdom by any British subject (whatever may be the domicile of such person at the time of making the same or at the time of his death) shall as regards personal estate be held to be well executed, and shall be admitted to probate, if the same be executed according to the forms required by the laws for the time being in force in that part of the United Kingdom where (r) "This of course is not conclusive (as to which see Nevinson v. Stables, 4 Russ. 210), though the fact of a testator being described as resident abroad would produce suspicion and inquiry as to the foreign domicile" (note by Mr. Jarman).

(s) 10 Moo. P. C. C. 306. The case was a curious one; for the law of France does not permit a foreigner to acquire a domicile there, so as to affect the mode of making a will, without licence from the Government; in other words, without such licence the foreigner may make a will according to the law of his nationality. In France, therefore, the English will would have been held good (see Sug. R. P. S. p. 404; Collier v. Rivaz, 2 Curt. 855; Re Trufort, L. R., 36 Ch. D. 600), and it had in fact been pronounced valid on that ground by the Prerogative Court (1 Deane, 192).

the same is made. By sect. 4 the act is not to invalidate any will or other testamentary instrument as regards personal estate which would have been valid if the act had not been passed, except as such will or instrument may be revoked or altered by any subsequent will or testamentary instrument made valid by the act.

Thus, for the purpose of British probate, a choice is given among several forms of execution, all in addition (s. 4) to that which alone was formerly sufficient: and, in terms, the act is directed only to modes of execution; but it has been held that a testamentary instrument, depending on the act for the validity of its execution, must also depend, for its acceptance as a valid testamentary disposition, on the local law on which its execution is rested. Thus, in Pechell v. Hilderley (u), a British subject with an English domicile died in 1867, leaving a will and codicil, neither of which was executed according to the law of England, but the codicil (though not the will) was well executed according to the law of Italy, where it was made. By that law, as proved in the case, it could not stand alone without the will, and did not set up the will, although indorsed upon it. It was argued that the codicil being well executed according to the act, its legal effect must be determined by the lex domicilii, and that according to that law the codicil established and made good the will (v). But Lord Penzance was of opinion that in determining the question whether any paper was testamentary, regard could be had to the law of one country only at a time, and that the mixing up of the legal precepts of two different countries could only result in conclusions conformable to neither. The Court therefore pronounced against both documents. But in In bonis Lacroix (w) a naturalised British subject executed at Paris a will and codicil in English form relating to his English property only, and a holograph will in French form disposing of his property in France, but referring directly to the English will; Sir J. Hannen seemed to think, assuming the testator's domicile to be French, that all three instruments might be admitted to probate under Lord Kingsdown's Act; eventually, however, probate was granted of the English will and codicil only.

Notwithstanding the words "according to the forms required by the law of the place" where the will is made, sect. 1 of the act applies to a country the law of which does not provide any forms for testamentary dispositions; if a British subject desires to make his will in such a place, any writing which can be identified as a will is apparently sufficient; at all events a holograph will signed by the testator is sufficient (x).

The expression "personal estate" in sect. 1 of the act, includes leaseholds situate in England (y).

"Personal estate" includes leaseholds.
Scope of act.

Sections 1, 2 and 4 of Lord Kingsdown's Act affect British subjects only, and therefore do not apply to any subject of a foreign country (z), even in the case of a woman born a British subject who has become a foreign subject by marriage (a). On the other hand, they apply to naturalised British subjects (b), although sect. 1 assumes that the testator had his domicile of origin in some part of the British dominions. It seems clear that the act only refers to the validity of the will in point of form, and that it does not affect any question as to its material validity, such as the question of testamentary capacity (c).

III.—Conflict of Laws.—Even if Lord Kingsdown's Act does affect the question of testamentary capacity (as appears to be assumed by some writers (d)), it is clear that foreign Courts are not bound to recognise the act in determining whether a given instrument is a valid will of personal property within their own jurisdiction: and thus the personal property, British and foreign, of a British subject may be distributable according to two distinct laws. Therefore, the necessity of conforming in the testamentary act to the law of the domicile, is still an important doctrine to the numerous British residents in foreign countries; and it appears that the circumstance of the contents of the will indicating that the testator contemplated returning to England (but which intention he never executed (e)), or even an express declaration that he intends to retain his domicile of origin (f), is insufficient to exclude the law of his domicile ascertained by the facts of the case (g).

Some foreign countries do not recognise domicile as governing the succession to the moveable property of a deceased person, but treat it as governed by the law of the country of which he was a subject. The right principle to be applied in cases of this kind cannot be said to be satisfactorily settled, but at present the result appears to be that a British subject who makes his permanent home in such a country retains his domicile of birth so far as regards the distribution of his property in England (h).

Suggestions
Englishmen

If an Englishman, domiciled abroad, has real estate (including in this definition property held by him for terms of years) in his native country, and also personal property there or elsewhere, he ought to make two wills, one devising his English lands, duly framed and executed for that purpose according to the forms of the English law, and the other bequeathing, if permitted, his personal (or rather his moveable) estate conformably to the foreign law. Wills made under such circumstances require more than ordinary care, in order to avoid some perplexing questions arising out of the conflict in the laws governing the real and personal property respectively (i), and also in order to avoid any question of incorporation by reference (j).

As to Scotland.

Such questions may arise, and indeed have most frequently arisen, in regard to the property of Englishmen domiciled in Scotland, or of Scotchmen domiciled in England; the law of succession and testamentary disposition being, in some respects, different in these two sections of the United Kingdom (k). Thus, in Balfour v. Scott (l), where a person domiciled in England died intestate, leaving real estate in Scotland, the heir was one of the next of kin, and claimed a share of the personal estate. By the law of (k) In Scotland there was formerly no direct power of disposing of real estate by will, but if there was a conveyance previously executed according to the proper feudal forms, the party might by will declare the use and trust to which it should enure. Per Sir W. Grant in Brodie v. Barry, 2 V. & B. 132. But by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 101, s. 20, land in Scotland may now be disposed of directly by will. Where a domiciled Scotchman dies intestate, leaving infant children, and possessed of property in Scotland and England, the Court of Session, it seems, appoints a factor to the children, to whom the English Court grants administration: In bonis Johnston, 4 Hagg. 182; see Studd v. Cook, 8 App. Ca. 577.

In previous editions of this work it was suggested that if a Scotchman, i.e. a British subject, were to make a will, which by the law of Scotland is not revoked by marriage, and were subsequently to marry in England after having acquired an English domicile, a question of some nicety might probably arise as to whether the will was revoked by the marriage. See per Wilde, J., in In bonis Reid, L. R., 1 P. & D. at p. 76. In a similar case (Re Martin, [1900] P. 211) it was decided that the will was revoked by the marriage, but in that case the domicile of the husband at the time of the marriage was English.

(l) 6 Br. P. C. 550, stated in Somerville v. Lord Somerville, 5 Ves. 750, and cited 2 V. & B. 131; and see Allen v. Anderson, 5 Hare, 163.

Scotland, the heir cannot share in the personal property with the other next of kin, except on condition of collating the real estate ; that is, bringing it into a mass with the personal estate, to form one common subject of division (m). It was determined, however, that he was entitled to take his share without complying with that obligation, the case being regulated as to the moveable property by the English law.

In Drummond v. Drummond (n), a person domiciled in England had real estate in Scotland, upon which he granted a heritable bond to secure a debt contracted in England. He died intestate ; and the question was, by which of the estates this debt was to be borne ? By the English law then in force (o), the personal estate was the primary fund for the payment of debts ; but, by the law of Scotland, the real estate was the primary fund for the payment of the heritable bond. It was determined that the law of Scotland should prevail, and that the real estate must bear the burden (p).

Speaking of these two cases, Sir Wm. Grant has observed (q) : “ In the first case, the disability of the heir did not follow him to England ; and the personal estate was distributed as if both the domicile and the real estate had been in England. In the second, the disability to claim exoneration out of the personalty did follow him into England ; and the personal estate was distributed as if both the domicile and the real estate had been in Scotland.”

But by the law of Scotland, as of England, real estate is only a subsidiary fund for the payment of moveable debts ; and if the Scotch heir of a domiciled Englishman has paid them, the law of the domicile allows him to recover against the personal estate (r). Conversely, English rules of marshalling in favour of legatees will not be applied so as to throw on Scotch real estate debts of a domiciled Englishman, to which it could not be made liable by the lex loci (s).

(n) 6 Br. P. C. 601, cit. 2 V. & B. 132.

(o) An heir or devisee cannot now claim payment of a mortgage debt out of the testator's personal assets ; see s. 1 of Locke King's Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 113.

(p) But an express direction by a testator domiciled in England for payment of all his debts out of a specified fund will include the heritable bond : Maxwell v. Maxwell, L. R., 4 H. L. 506. Locke King's Acts (post, Chap. LIV.) do not extend to Scotland. A heritable bond will not pass by an English will : Jerningham v. Herbert, 4 Russ. 388 ; but where there is an English security, and the debt is further secured by a Scotch heritable bond, the debt will pass by an English will : Buccleuch v. Hoare, 4 Mad. 467 ; Cust v. Goring, 18 Beav. 383. See further as to the nature of heritable bonds, Bell's Commentaries on the Laws of Scotland, 206 ; Ersk. Inst. 194.

CHAPTER I.

In all these cases the claim on the Scotch heir to exoneration, or his liability to be charged, was enforced by English Courts in distributing the personal estate only where the laws of both countries agreed in conceding the claim or imposing the charge.

IV.—Domicil.—A statement of some of the more important rules for ascertaining the domicil of a testator, and a reference to the cases of most frequent occurrence, may here be made (t).

The question of domicil is determined by English Courts according to the doctrines of English law, except (it seems) in those cases in which a person is resident in a country which does not recognise domicil as regulating questions of succession (tt).

The law attributes to everyone as soon as he is born the domicil of his father, if he be legitimate, and the domicil of his mother, if illegitimate (u). This is the domicil of birth, or, as it is more frequently called, the domicil of origin (v), and is involuntary. Another instance of involuntary domicil is where the domicil of an infant is changed by a change in the domicil of its father, or, in the case of a fatherless infant, by a change in the domicil and other acts on the part of its mother (w). So the domicil of a lunatic adult may be changed by a change in the domicil of his parent (x). In all these cases the altered domicil cannot be regarded as the domicil of origin; it is an acquired domicil (y). Probably the domicil

(t) As to domicil generally, see Dicey, Conflict of Laws; Westlake, Private Int. Law; and a valuable note in Hayes and Jarman's Concise Forms of Wills. Most of the definitions of domicil have been copied from the Roman law, in ignorance of the fact that in Roman law domicilium meant something quite different from what we understand by "domicil"; hence these definitions are inaccurate when applied to English law: see the judgment of Kindersley, V.-C., in Lord v. Colvin, 28 L. J. Ch. 361, where a useful definition of "acquired domicil" (that is, a domicil of choice) is given. There was formerly some confusion between the two ideas of nationality and domicil, but the distinction is now too clearly recognised to require discussion. See Udny v. Udny, L. R., 1 H. L. Sc. 441; Haldane v. Eckford, L. R., 8 Eq. 631 (where Re Capdevielle, 2 H. & C. 985; Att.-Gen. v. Countess Blucher de Wahlstatt, 3 H. & C. 374, and Moorhouse v. Lord, 10 H. L. C. 272, are referred to); Brunel v. Brunel, L. R., 12 Eq. 298; Douglas v. Douglas, L. R., 12 Eq. 617.

Sc. 441, where the earlier cases, including The Indian Chief, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 12, and Munroe v. Douglas, 5 Madd. 405 (in which Sir John Leach laid down much bad law), are referred to.

(v) The expression is not strictly accurate, for in Roman law domicilium and origo were two distinct things: see Sweet's Law Dictionary, s. v., "Domicile." In Winans v. Att.-Gen., [1904] A. C. p. 290, Lord Macnaghten expressed a preference for the term "domicil of origin."

which a woman acquires by marrying a man with a different domicile to her own may be looked upon as an involuntary domicile (z), but the point is not material, as the important distinction is between the domicile of origin and an acquired domicile, whether voluntary or involuntary.

The chief points which require to be borne in mind in connection with the domicile of origin are: that everyone is assumed to preserve his domicile of origin until it is shewn that he has acquired another domicile; that there is a presumption against a man's intention to abandon his domicile of origin; that the domicile of origin revives if a man loses his acquired domicile; and that it is more difficult to lose the domicile of origin than an acquired domicile¹(a).

A man cannot have more than one testamentary domicile (b).

A man cannot have two domicils.

As soon as an individual is sui juris, it is competent to him to abandon his domicile of origin, and to elect and assume another domicile, which is called his domicile of choice (c). When another domicile is put on, the domicile of origin is for that purpose relinquished, and remains in abeyance during the continuance of the domicile of choice, but it revives and exists whenever there is no other domicile (as when the domicile of choice is in fact abandoned (d) with the intention of never returning), and it does not require to be regained or reconstituted animo et facto in the manner which is necessary for the acquisition of a domicile of choice (e). Domicile of choice is constituted by residence freely chosen and intended to continue for a non-limited period (f); and length of residence

Recurrence of domicile of origin.

(z) In Udny v. Udny, Lord Westbury said that domicile by operation of law, as on marriage, is a domicile of choice; but this, of course, was a mere expression of opinion. His statement that all domicils, other than the domicile of origin, are domicils of choice, is clearly inaccurate.

(b) Forbes v. Forbes, Kay, 353. See Dicey, p. 98. The notion that a man can have two domicils is probably derived partly from a misapprehension as to the meaning of domicilium in Roman law (see Sweet's Law Dictionary, s. v.) and partly from the use of the French word domicile in the sense of "residence"; see McMullen v. Wadsworth, 14 A. C. 631, where the phrase "international domicile" appears to be used as meaning "domicil" in the proper sense of the term.

(c) See Bempde v. Johnstone, 3 Ves. 198; Drevon v. Drevon, 12 W. R. 946; King v. Foxwell, 3 Ch. D. 518.

(d) The intention without the act of abandonment is insufficient: In b. Raffell, 32 L. J. Prob. 203; Re Marrett, 36 Ch. D. 400. And the mere fact that a person sails for his native country from the country where he has acquired a domicile of choice, does not prove that he intended to abandon it: Lyall v. Paton, 25 L. J. Ch. 746 (where the testator died in itinere).

(f) As to what constitutes a non-limited period, see Anderson v. Laneville, 9 Moo. P. C. 325.

CHAPTER I.

is a most important ingredient from which to infer the animus manendi (g), but it is not conclusive (h).

The burden of proof is on those who allege that the domicile of origin has been lost (i).

residence is

“The question of domicile,” said Lord Loughborough, in the case of Bempde v. Johnstone (j), “primâ facie is much more a question of fact than of law. The actual place where [a person] is, is primâ facie to a great many given purposes his domicile. You encounter that, if you shew, it is either constrained, or from the necessity of his affairs, or transitory; that he is a sojourner; and you take from it all character of permanency. If on the contrary you shew, that the place of his residence is the seat of his fortune; if the place of his birth, upon which I lay the least stress; but if the place of his education, where he acquired all his early habits, friends and connections, and all the links that attach him to society, are found there; if you add to that, that he had no other fixed residence upon an establishment of his own, you answer the question; which would be, where does he reside? In London. Is that his domicile? It is: unless you shew, that is not the place where he would be, if there were no particular circumstance to determine his position in some other place at that period.”

Lord Loughborough's remark that a transitory residence in a country is not sufficient to shew that the person in question has acquired a domicile of choice there, is borne out by the decision in Re Patience (k). In that case P.'s domicile of origin was Scotch; he was in the Army and served abroad until 1860, when he retired; from that time until his death in 1882 he resided in lodgings, hotels, and boarding houses in various places in England; from the year 1810 till his death he never revisited Scotland, and he left no property whatever in that country: it was held that his domicile was Scotch (l). On the other hand, in Re Craignish (m), where the plaintiff's domicile of origin was Scotch, it was held on the evidence that he had acquired a domicile in England; he had led a roving life in all parts of the world until he married, when he came to London, and lived there in hotels and lodgings for a few years, when he took a furnished house; he never seems to have had a permanent "home" in England, but his intention to settle in that country appeared from his mode of life. Att.-Gen. v. Dunn (n), Goulder v. Goulder (o), and Winans v. Att.-Gen. (p), are also cases in each of which the unsettled life of the testator made it difficult to say with confidence where his "home" was.

By the Domicile Act, 1861, power is given to the Crown to make conventions with foreign countries for the purpose of establishing rules as to the formalities required for a change of domicile by subjects of the two countries between which the convention is made. As to the operation of this act, see Sugd. R. P. S. p. 405. It is believed that no such convention has been entered into.

(l) Lord v. Colvin, 28 L. J. Ch. 361, and Huntly v. Gaskell, [1906] A. C. 56, are other examples of the strictness with which an intention to acquire a new domicile must be proved.

(m) [1892] 3 Ch. 180. This was a peculiar case, inasmuch as the question arose during the lifetime of the person whose domicile was in dispute.

Where an Englishman or Scotchman divides his time about equally between the two countries, the actual domicile is sometimes difficult to be ascertained, from the absence of preponderating evidence in favour of either. Such was the case of Lord Somerville (q), a Scotchman, originally domiciled in Scotland, who was elected a representative peer of Scotland, took a house in London, and lived there half the year, the remainder of which he spent in Scotland, where he still had an establishment; he died at his house in London. Sir R. P. Arden, M. R., after an elaborate argument, held that the original domicile remained unchanged, and, consequently, the succession to the personal property of the deceased nobleman (who had died intestate) was to be governed by the law of Scotland. In cases of residence equally divided between two places, the constant residence of his wife and family in one of them is strong evidence of animus in favour of domicile in that place (r).

residence.

The fact that a man, living in a foreign country, marries a woman who is a native of that country, tends to shew an intention on his part to make it his permanent home (s).

Lord Loughborough's remark that a residence which is "constrained" does not produce a change of domicile, is also borne out by the authorities.

the duties of military or naval service (t); or of a temporary political (u) or judicial (v) office; by imprisonment (w), or by flight from civil commotion or revolution (x) or to avoid creditors (y); it will not confer a domicile (z). But if a person comes to England to escape a sentence of imprisonment passed upon him in his native country, this will not prevent his acquiring an English domicile. if he shews an intention of settling permanently in this country (a). Again, neither an ambassador (b), nor a consul (c), loses his original domicile merely by residence in the foreign country where he is accredited. But a person holding a permanent office in an English colony which requires his residence there, may shew an intention of making it his home (d). So an ambassador (e), or a consul (f), may by his conduct and declarations shew an intention to acquire a domicile in the country where he lives. And if a consul engage in trade, his character of consul is, for some purposes at least, merged in that of merchant (g). On the other hand, if, being already domiciled in a foreign country, a man be appointed by his own sovereign ambassador (h) or consul (i) in that country, his original domicile is not thereby revived. The status of an English peer does not prevent his acquiring a foreign domicile (j).

It is said that if a foreigner enters the military service of the

With a few immaterial differences, the stat. 1 Vict. c. 26 was made law in India by an act of council, No. 25, A.D. 1838, and applies to all wills made on or after February 1, 1839. And by the Indian Succession Act (Act X.), 1865, succession to immoveable property in India is regulated by the law of India; that to moveables by the law of the domicile. See *Macdonald v. United Kingdom, he thereby acquires an English domicile (k). If so, sufficient importance was not given to the fact in the case of Re Duleep Singh (l).

Where, as in the United Kingdom, different laws prevail in different parts, a domicile in one, as in Jersey or Scotland, is not altered by entering the military or naval service of the kingdom, whether the domicile is original (m) or acquired (n). And apparently the same rule applies to the civil service (o).

The old decisions on the so-called Anglo-Indian domicile acquired by the servants of the East India Company (p) are anomalous, and the effect of a residence in India is a matter of doubt (q).

Attempts have been made to establish the doctrine that a kind of extra-territorial domicile may be acquired in such countries as China and Turkey, where British subjects have established settlements under the protection of treaties entered into between the British Government and the Government of the country, but it is settled that "the idea of a domicile, independent of locality, and arising simply from membership of a privileged society, is not reconcilable with any of the numerous definitions of domicile to be found in the books" (r). There is, therefore, no such thing as an Anglo-Chinese or Anglo-Egyptian domicile.

The effect of residence in conferring a new domicile may also be counteracted by the nature of the community in which the testator lived. If there is a fundamental difference between the religion, laws, habits and customs of that community and those of the testator's native country—as where he, being an Englishman, has resided in a country like China or Turkey—a strong presumption is raised against his having acquired a domicile in that country (s).

On the other hand, it seems clear that if a person has made up his mind to leave the place of his original domicile and permanently settle in another country, a residence in pursuance of that intention, however short, will establish a domicile there (t).

CHAPTER I.

Residence for business : intention to return.

Declarations of intention to return.

If it appears that a man resides in a foreign country for the purposes of his private business, always retaining the wish and intention of returning to his native country, he does not lose his domicile of origin (u). But vague expressions of an intention to return at some indefinite future time—such as “when I have made my fortune”—are not of themselves sufficient to shew that a man's residence is temporary (v). And as a general rule, a man who settles as a trader in a foreign country will thereby commonly acquire a domicile in that country (w) ; nor is the contrary to be inferred merely because, being a British subject, he invariably acts and regards himself as an Englishman (x). Nor will his being an officer in the British service on half-pay, and (in order to retain his pay) requiring and obtaining leave of absence (y), nor being an officer on unlimited furlough, subject to a positive obligation to return to duty when ordered (z), prevent his acquiring a domicile other than British ; though such an obligation would be strong to rebut any presumption that a domicile was contemplated in a foreign country where the obligation could not be enforced, for an intention contrary to duty is not to be presumed (a).

Residence in any place for health's sake is of dubious import ; and further manifestation of intention is requisite before such residence can be assumed to be permanent (b).

In a case where no special circumstances of the kind above referred to present themselves, it may be laid down, as a general rule, that if a person has in fact taken up a permanent residence in a country he will be deemed to have acquired a domicile of choice there, and mere declarations of an intention to return to the country of his birth will not be sufficient to rebut that presumption, so as to revive the original domicile (c).

The general rule is that the domicil of a married woman is that of her husband, and that married women cannot change their domicil of their own acts (d). But a wife after a decree of divorce can acquire a domicil of choice (e). Whether the same rule applies to a wife who has been judicially separated from her husband (f), or whose husband has deserted her, or committed some other offence entitling her to a divorce or a judicial separation (g), has not been decided. But it is clear that a woman who is living apart from her husband, under an agreement for separation, cannot choose her own domicil (h).

The domicil of a legitimate child is that of the father, and the domicil of an illegitimate child is that of the mother (i). The domicil of the child changes with the domicil of the father or mother.

It has been made a question, whether infant children, who, after the death of the father, remain under the care of their mother, follow the domicil which she may from time to time acquire, or retain that which their father had at his death, until they are capable of gaining one by acts of their own. As a general rule, the domicil of the children in such a case follows that of the mother. Thus, where an Englishman domiciled in Guernsey, died there, and the widow came to England and took up her residence there, bringing her children with her; it was held, that the succession to the personal property of two of her children, who died there at an early age, was to be governed by the law of England, there being no ground to impute the removal to fraudulent intention (j). It has been suggested that a widow on re-marriage loses the power to change the domicil of the infant children of her former marriage, and that they consequently retain the domicil which their mother had immediately before her re-marriage. But the true rule has been laid down by Stirling, J. (k), namely, that the change in the domicile of a fatherless infant, which may follow from a change of domicile on the part of the mother, is not a necessary consequence of the change in the mother's domicile, but is the result of the exercise by her of a power vested in her for the welfare of the infant, which, in their interest, she may abstain from exercising, even when she changes her own domicile, and the better view seems to be that this power is not lost by her re-marriage.

Lunatic.

If a man at the time he attains his majority is of unsound mind, and remains in that state continuously up to the time of his death, the incapacity of minority is in effect continued, so as to confer upon the father the right of choice in the matter of domicile for his son, and a change of domicile by the father will usually produce a similar change of domicile as regards the son. In order that such a change of domicile may be produced, it is necessary that the son should be under the control of his father (m).

laws as to domicil.

When a British subject takes up his permanent residence in a country, the laws of which do not recognise domicile as governing the devolution of property after death, or which do not permit a domicile to be acquired by mere residence, the question arises whether English law will treat him as having acquired a domicile in that country. It is difficult, if not impossible, to reconcile the decisions on this question. The authority of Collier v. Rivaz (n) has been shaken by Bremer v. Freeman (o), the case which led to the passing of Lord Kingsdown's Act. In Re Trufort (p) a British subject became a Swiss subject, and afterwards went to reside in France, where, according to English law (q), he was domiciled at his death; according to French law, the succession to his personal property was governed by the law of Switzerland: the English Court accepted this view, and distributed the property in accordance with a decision of the Swiss Courts, which was accepted as binding on the English Court. There was, therefore, no conflict of laws (r). In Hamilton v. Dallas (s), it was held that the deceased had acquired a "de facto domicile" in France, although he had not complied with the requirements of the Code Napoleon. In Re Johnson (t), on the other hand, it was held that the moveable property of a British subject is not distributable in accordance with the law of his domicile, if he has resided in a country the law of which does not recognise domicile for purposes of succession. In that case the law of Baden (where the testatrix had lived for many years) treated nationality as governing the question of succession, and her moveable property was distributed by our Courts in accordance with the law of Malta, which was her domicile of origin. It is submitted that the question requires further consideration (u).

It sometimes happens that a person has a French domicile according to English law, and an English domicile according to French law. In such a case a will executed by him according to the requirements of English law may be proved in England in order to enable the French Courts to give effect to it (v).

(r) As to the bearing of this case on the doctrine of Renvoi, see Dicey, 718 seq., where attention is drawn to the distinction between renvoi as meaning "remittal," and renvoi as meaning "transmission."

(u) See a note on the case by Mr. Dicey in the Law Quarterly Review (xix. 244), and in his Conflict of Laws (pp. 715 seq.). It is submitted that the true solution of the difficulty is that suggested by him, namely, that the moveables of the deceased should have been distributed in the manner in which the Courts in Baden would have distributed them if they had been within their jurisdiction. A different view is taken by Mr. Bate, Doctrine of Renvoi, pp. 115 seq. See also Mr. Westlake's International Law; his theory of a "modified renvoi" is criticised by Mr. E. H. Abbot, jun., in Law Q. Review, xxiv. 133.*

I.—Preliminary.—Mr. Jarman points out (a) that “ in a general and comprehensive sense, a will consists of the aggregate of all the papers through which it is dispersed ” ; or, as it has also been put, a will is the aggregate of a man’s testamentary intentions so far as they are manifested in writing, duly executed according to the statute (b). In this sense, therefore, it includes a codicil. But sometimes the term “ will ” is used as opposed to “ codicil,” the distinction between the two being that the will is the principal, and the codicil the accessory ; a codicil is a supplement by which the testator alters or adds to his will. But these distinctions are to some extent questions of terminology, for a man may execute two or more instruments, each purporting to be a will (c), and together constituting one will (d). And on the other hand, if he leaves nothing but an instrument described as a codicil, it may take effect as a will (e). The distinction is of importance where a man own property. As to wills disposing of property in different countries, see ante, p. 14 and post, p. 37.

(d) See the quotation from Douglas-Menzies v. Umphelby, infra, p. 38 ; and see post, Chap. VII. (revocation by subsequent inconsistent will, &c.).

revokes or revives his "will," for the question arises whether he thereby intends to revoke or revive a codicil to it (f). And where a will consists of two or more documents, a person who attests one of them does not forfeit a benefit given him by another, if the latter is separately executed and attested (ff).

II.—What Instruments are Testamentary.—"A will," says Mr. Jarman (g), "is an instrument by which a person makes a disposition (h) of his property to take effect after his decease (i), and which is in its own nature ambulatory and revocable during his life (j). It is this ambulatory quality which forms the characteristic of wills; for, though a disposition by deed may postpone the possession or enjoyment, or even the vesting, until the death of the disposing party, yet the postponement is in such case produced by the express terms, and does not result from the nature, of the instrument. Thus, if a man, by deed, limit lands to the use of himself for life, with remainder to the use of A. in fee, the effect upon the usufructuary enjoyment is precisely the same as if he should, by his will, make an immediate devise of such lands to A. in fee; and yet the case fully illustrates the distinction in question; for, in the former instance, A., immediately on the execution of the deed, becomes entitled to a remainder in fee, though it is not to take effect in possession until the decease of the settlor, while, in the latter, he would take no interest whatever until the decease of the testator should have called the instrument into operation."

nature of

It will be noticed that Mr. Jarman's definition includes only wills which dispose of property, and his treatment of the subject, therefore, does not extend to testamentary dispositions of a personal

Ash*, 33 Bea. 187. And if a will altogether fails to take effect by reason of the death of the sole executor and legatee in the lifetime of the testator, there is an intestacy: Re Ford, [1902] 2 Ch. 605.

character, such as the question in what manner and by what words a testator may appoint executors (k) or guardians (l).

A testator may give directions as to the religion in which he wishes his children to be brought up (m).

Appointment
agent, &c.

Where a testator appoints a person to be solicitor or agent to his estate, or authorises an executor or trustee to make professional charges, this amounts to the bequest of a right to remuneration for services properly performed (n).

Attempts to make will irrevocable.

As a will is of its own nature revocable, a declaration by a testator that his will is irrevocable is inoperative (o). A covenant not to revoke a will cannot be specifically enforced, but an action for damages will lie for the breach of it, unless the will was revoked by the marriage of the covenantor (p).

Contract to leave

As a general rule, a contract to bequeath a legacy or to leave property by will cannot be specifically enforced, and only gives rise to an action for damages (q), but in certain cases contracts of this kind have been given effect to specifically. Thus a covenant (or apparently any contract for valuable consideration) to devise land in a particular way can be specifically enforced against the

The liability is not necessarily discharged by a devise or bequest: Eyre v. Monro, 3 K. & J. 305; Graham v. Wickham, 1 D. J. & S. 474. As to the effect of the covenantee dying in the testator's lifetime, see Jones v. How, 7 Ha. 267. As to such a covenant being satisfied by a bequest of a different nature, or by a distributive share under an intestacy, see Goldsmid v. Goldsmid, 1 Sw. 214, and Mr. Swanston's note; *Salisbury v. testator's heir at law, or persons claiming under him as volunteers (r). And if during his lifetime the testator conveys the land to a third person, an immediate right of action to recover damages accrues to the promisee (s).

As a general rule, a covenant by a man to leave by will all his property, or a share of all his property, in a certain way, only applies to such property as he dies possessed of, and does not prevent him from disposing during his lifetime of any part of his property (t). The Courts have, however, in certain cases defeated attempts to evade such a covenant. Thus in Lewis v. Madocks (u), an agreement to settle personal property was not allowed to be evaded by investing it in the purchase of land. Again, in Fortescue v. Hennah (v), a father covenanted on the marriage of one of his two daughters that on his death all his property which he should die possessed of should be held in trust for his two daughters in equal shares. He afterwards disposed of part of his property in favour of various persons, reserving a life interest for himself. Grant, M. R., said that although a covenant of this kind did not prevent the testator from making bonâ fide dispositions of his property during his life, he could not defeat it by dispositions which were in effect testamentary, though not such in point of form; and he held that the property of which the testator reserved the life interest was, for the purposes of the covenant, to be considered as part of the property which he possessed at the time of his death. The case of Logan v. Wienholt (w) seems to have been decided on the same principle.

A covenant to bequeath a certain sum is not satisfied by a testamentary appointment of that sum under a special power, although expressed to be made in satisfaction of the covenant (x).

A legacy bequeathed in pursuance of a covenant is on the same footing as ordinary legacies with regard to lapse, debts, &c. (y).

CHAPTER II.

Covenant to exercise power.
Evidence of animus testandi,

As to the validity of covenants to exercise testamentary powers, see Chapter XXIII.

It is essential to the validity of a will that at the time of its execution the testator should know and approve of its contents (z). And whenever any ground for suspicion exists, the burden of proving that the will was the voluntary and conscious act of the testator lies on him who propounds the will (a). The degree of proof required may vary with the circumstances of the case. If a person writes or prepares a will under which he takes a benefit, that is a circumstance which ought generally to excite the suspicion of the Court, and it ought not to pronounce the will valid unless the suspicion is removed and it is judicially satisfied that the paper propounded expresses the true will of the deceased (b).

A document which is in form a testamentary disposition by a person competent to make a will, and executed with all due formalities, may nevertheless be proved not to be the will of the person who signed it, on the ground that the requisite animus testandi was wanting. Accordingly, if the execution of a will has been induced by mistake, probate of it will be refused. Thus, where two sisters made mutual wills in favour of each other, the words mutatis mutandis being precisely the same, and by mistake each signed the will of the other, both wills were held invalid (c). So if words have been inserted in a will by mistake of the person who prepared it, and the attention of the testator is not called to them, they will be omitted from the probate (d), although the right words cannot be inserted (e). The Court of Construction,

Where the onus of proof is thus cast on the party propounding the will, a person opposing it is prima facie justified in pleading undue influence and fraud, and in a proper case will be entitled to costs: *Wilson v. however, although it cannot (in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction) change the words of a will (f), may construe the will on the assumption that words have been inserted or omitted by mistake (g).

In In bonis Douce (h), a man named Thomas Douce, who could neither read nor write, requested A. to prepare a will for him; A. did so, but erroneously described the testator throughout as "John Douce." Thomas Douce executed it by making his mark, and it was duly attested. It was clear from the terms of the will and the surrounding circumstances that the will was that of Thomas Douce, and it was admitted to probate as his will. Here, of course, the animus testandi was present.

But where a testator makes two wills, the second of which revokes the first, and then makes a codicil referring to the first will, parol evidence is not admissible to shew that this was a mistake, and that he meant to refer to the second will (i). By consent, however, the Court of Probate can allow the mistaken reference to be omitted from the probate (j).

Mistaken
revoked will.

Nor is evidence admissible to shew that a legacy was inserted in the will by mistake, if there is a person in existence answering the description of the legatee (k). And as a general rule, a bequest which is induced by a mistake on the part of the testator is nevertheless valid (l).

Gift inserted by mistake.

From the general principle that animus testandi is essential to the validity of a will, it follows that where a document purporting to be a will is deliberately executed with all due formalities, yet if it is intended by the person executing it not to have any testamentary operation, but is executed for some collateral object (e.g., to be shewn to another person to induce him to comply with the pretended testator's wish), it is a nullity, and probate will be refused (m).

Sham will.

A will may also be invalid on the ground that its execution was induced by fraud (n), coercion, or undue influence (o). In many of these cases there is also present the element of physical or mental weakness (p). So if a portion of a will was inserted by fraud or undue influence, it may be omitted from the probate (q).

omission of legacies.

In Mitchell v. Gard (r), the residuary legatee, who prepared the will, intentionally omitted some legacies which he had been directed to insert, and the omission was not noticed by the testatrix: it was held that the will was nevertheless valid. Probably in such a case the residuary legatee would be held to be a trustee for the disappointed legatees.

Will prepared by another.

If a man requests another to draw up a will for him without saying what he desires it to contain, and executes it without knowing its contents, the will is bad (s); but a will prepared in good faith in pursuance of the testator's definite instructions is valid, if at the time of execution he believes it to have been so prepared, although he may then be mentally incapable of understanding it (t). And if in drawing up a will by the instructions of the testator, the draughtsman, without reason or special directions, but in good faith, introduces words the effect of which the testator does not intelligently appreciate when the will is read over to him, they must stand as part of the will (u); the rule is the same even if the testator asks to have them explained, and their effect is, in good faith, misrepresented to him (v). But if they were inserted by mistake, and there is no clear evidence that they were really brought to the mind of the testator, they will be omitted from the probate (w).

Presumption
over will

As a general rule, in the absence of suspicious circumstances, the fact that a will has been read by, or read over to, the testator affords a strong presumption that he understood and approved of its contents (x); but there is no inflexible rule on the subject (y).

As Mr. Jarman points out (z) : “ The law has not made requisite, to the validity of a will, that it should assume any particular form, or be couched in language technically appropriate to its testamentary character. It is sufficient that the instrument, however irregular in form or inartificial in expression, discloses the intention of the maker respecting the posthumous destination of his property ; and, if this appear to be the nature of its contents, any contrary title or designation which he may have given to it will be disregarded (a).

“ Thus (b), a deed-poll, and even an agreement or other instrument between parties, has repeatedly been held to have a testamentary operation. As, in Hixon v. Wytham (c), where A. by indenture made between him on the one part, and B. and C. of the other part, in consideration of 5*l.*, bargained and sold to them certain lands in trust to sell after his decease, and directed the money to arise by the sale to be employed in the payment of certain sums therein mentioned, and the rest thereof, and all his personal estate, he gave and bequeathed (for the language was here changed to the first person) in favour of certain persons. A. made B. and C. executors of his will ; and signed, sealed, published and declared the instrument as his will in the presence of several witnesses. The Court declared this to be a good will.

Instruments in the form of deeds, agreements, &c., held to be testamentary.

Instrument commencing as an indenture, but ending as a will.

“ So, in Green v. Proude (d), where, by instrument entitled ‘ Articles of Agreement,’ made between A. of the one part, and B. of the other part : it was agreed between them that A., being sick in body, gives, &c. ; in consideration whereof B. promised to pay several sums of money. The instrument concluded in the ordinary manner of deeds, i.e. ‘ in witness whereof the parties have hereunto interchangeably set their hands and seals.’ This instrument was delivered as a deed ; but it was held to be testamentary, and as such revocable, and the Court seems to have been influenced by the circumstance, that the person who prepared it was instructed to make a will.”

CHAPTER II.

Mr. Jarman also cites Peacock v. Monk (e), Tomkyns v. Ladbroke (f), Hog v. Lashley (g), and Habergham v. Vincent (h), as illustrating the same principle. In Fielding v. Walshaw (i), a deed of gift referring to "sick and funeral moneys" was held to be testamentary, although it gave to the donor's wife certain benefits during his life, and although he orally declared that it was not intended to be a will.

Att.-Gen. v. Jones.
Whether property professedly settled by deed was liable to legacy duty.

The question, whether an instrument in the form of a deed operated as a will, was much discussed in Att.-Gen. v. Jones (j), where A., by indenture dated March 25, 1813, assigned, for a nominal pecuniary consideration, certain leasehold property to C. and D.; also certain stock, and all other his personal estate, upon trust for himself for life, and after his decease, for B. (an illegitimate daughter). The instrument reserved to A. a power of revocation by deed or will. By will, dated April 16, 1813, A. confirmed the deed except as to certain particulars, which he specified, and appointed the same persons as were trustees in the deed executors. A. did not transfer the stock, or part with the possession of the assigned property, or even communicate to the trustees the existence of the deed, which he retained in his own custody. The question was, whether the property assigned by it was liable to the legacy duty; and three of the Barons of the Exchequer (dissentiente Wood, B.) decided in the affirmative.

Tompson v. Browne.
Settlement reserving life interest to settlor, with power of revocation, held that the property was not liable to legacy duty.

This decision has been generally condemned, and may be regarded as overruled. In Tompson v. Browne (k), the question raised was whether an assignment by deed of personal property, reserving a life interest to the assignor, and giving him a power of revocation, was not testamentary, and the fund accordingly subject to legacy duty. The affirmative was attempted to be maintained on the authority of Att.-Gen. v. Jones; but Sir C. C. Pepys, M. R., decided that the legacy duty did not attach. "The decision in Att.-Gen. v.

(e) 1 Ves. sen. 127; Belt's Suppl. 82. The deed in this case contained a clause shewing that the instrument was designed to operate in the donor's lifetime. In a much earlier case (Audley's Case, 4 Leon. 166), it appears to have been considered as conclusive against the construing of an instrument as a will, that by it an estate was to be taken by the maker, "who could not take by his own will." From Lord Hardwicke's observations in Peacock v. Monk it would seem that he thought that an instrument might be testamentary for some purposes but not for others; as to

Jones," he said, "seems to have proceeded upon the ground that, under the circumstances of that case, nothing passed from the maker of the instrument, so as to entitle any other person to interfere with his property in his lifetime. If there be anything in that decision to support the notion, that where a person by deed settles property to his own use during his life, and after his decease for the benefit of other persons, a power of revocation reserved in such a deed alters the character of the instrument, and renders it testamentary, and consequently subject to legacy duty, I can only say that if this were law, a great number of transactions, of which the validity has never been doubted, would be liable to be impeached."

Although the remarks of the M. R. are expressed with great caution, they leave no doubt of his opinion of Att.-Gen. v. Jones, and when that case was cited to Lord St. Leonards in D. P. (l), he said, "That case is quite wrong."

In Marjoribanks v. Hovenden (m), an instrument commencing with a recital, and having an attestation clause, like a deed-poll, and sealed, stamped, and registered, was held by the same learned Lord not to be invested with a testamentary character by the mere nature of the power (a power to appoint by will, misrecited as a power to appoint by deed or will) under which it purported to be made. The fact of registration as a deed appears to have been deemed almost conclusive against its testamentary character.

Instrument sealed, stamped, an registered, not testamentary.

The Ecclesiastical Judges (before whom, of course, questions of this kind were formerly most frequently agitated) acted fully up to the principle which regards as testamentary any instrument that is designed not to take effect until the maker's decease, though assuming the form of a disposition inter vivos; and more especially if it be incapable of operation in the intended form (n); and accordingly, in repeated instances, probate was, under the old practice, granted of such irregular documents as the assignment of a bond by Rule in Ecclesiastical Courts as to instruments testamentary in substance but not in form.

(n) But now that all wills must be attested by two witnesses, the validity of an instrument as an actual disposition of property would, if not so attested, depend on the maintenance of its non-testamentary character: Mitchell v. Smith, 33 L. J. Ch. 596. If an instrument is clearly testamentary, but not duly attested, it will not be supported as a donatio mortis causâ: Re Hughes, 36 W. R. 821; *Solicitor to Treasury v. indorsement (o), receipts for stock and bills indorsed (p), a letter (q), marriage articles (r), and promissory notes, and notes payable by executors, in order to avoid the legacy duty (s), and cheques on a banker (t), though the testator made a subsequent will containing a clause revoking any former will or codicil (u). Even a list of articles, signed and attested, but without any words of bequest, has been held to be testamentary (v). On the same principle, Sir J. Nicholl admitted to probate, as testamentary, the drafts of three bonds, prepared in the lifetime of the deceased, and intended to be executed by him, to the trustees of the marriage settlement of his three daughters, in substitution for legacies which he had, by a revoked will, bequeathed for the benefit of the daughters, and the execution of which bonds was prevented by his death (w).

Instruments in the form of present or past gifts held testamentary.

Since the Wills Act, papers, duly signed and attested in accordance with the provisions of the act, in these words, "I wish A. to have my bank book for her own use" (x); "I hereby make a free gift to A. of the sum deposited," &c. (y); "I have given all to A. and her sons: they are to pay" certain weekly sums to "X. and Y., and to divide the residue among themselves" (z); have been held testamentary, chiefly upon collateral evidence, which is always admissible (a), that they were executed with that intent. And a paper purporting to be a nomination paper under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, may be admitted to probate if duly executed (b).

deeds inter partes.

Instruments in the form of deeds inter partes, and purporting to convey property to trustees, but providing that the trusts should not take effect until after the death of the donor, have been held testamentary in the Probate Court (d).

A paper merely expressing an intention to instruct a solicitor to prepare a will making a particular disposition of property, will not be admitted to probate in the absence of evidence of intention that such paper should have a testamentary operation (e). But instruments headed "Plan of a will" (f), or "Heads of a will" (g), or "Sketch of my will" (h), or "Memorandum of my intended will" (i), or "Notes of an intended settlement" (j), have been held to operate as valid testamentary dispositions, if duly executed (k). But probate was (l) refused of an instrument duly executed and attested as a will, but headed "This is not meant as a legal will, but as guide."

CHAPTER II
for a will.

It seems that a document commencing "I declare this to be a codicil to my will" may include words written above it on the same sheet of paper (m).

It seems that probate may be granted of part only of a document, if the remaining part is not testamentary (n).

It will of course be remembered that a document not executed as a will may be incorporated in a duly executed will, so as to form part of it (o).

Incorporated

A testator sometimes makes two wills, one relating to his property in England, and the other relating to his property in some foreign country. In such a case, if the wills are wholly independent, probate may be granted of the English will alone (p); or in some cases both wills may be proved (q). But if the English will refers to and incorporates the foreign will, or conversely, both wills must be included in the probate (r).

Concurrent
wills.

CHAPTER II.

and made a separate will disposing only of his immoveable property in Russia: it was held that the latter will could not be included in the probate.

Testator can only leave one will.

However many testamentary documents a testator may leave, "it is the aggregate or the net result that constitutes his will, or in other words, the expression of his testamentary wishes. The law, on a man's death, finds out what are the instruments which express his last will. If some extant writing be revoked, or is inconsistent with a later testamentary writing, it is discarded. But all that survive this scrutiny form part of the ultimate will or effective expression of his wishes about his estate. In this sense it is inaccurate to speak of a man leaving two wills; he does leave, and can leave, but one will" (t).

Paper testamentary in form.

Paper not testamentary in form or substance.

III.—What Instruments are not Testamentary.—As mentioned above, evidence is admissible to shew that an instrument apparently testamentary was not executed with that intent (u).

If an instrument is not testamentary either in form or in substance (none of the gifts in it being expressed in testamentary language, or being in terms postponed to the death of the maker), and if no collateral evidence is adduced to shew that it was intended as a will, probate will not be granted of it as a testamentary document. In one case (v), a minor aged nineteen (at a period when minors of such an age were capable of making wills of personal estate) wrote a paper in these words: "I, A. B., of &c., in the presence of the two under-mentioned witnesses, C. D. of &c., and E. F. of &c., do give all my goods and chattels to M. D. of —, spinster;" this paper was dated, and witnessed by the two persons referred to in the body of it; the Court was of opinion that, as the paper bore upon the face of it no evidence of its being intended to be testamentary, but it rather appeared, both from its contents and the evidence dehors (though the latter was rather conflicting), to have been intended as a present gift, probate ought not to be granted.

So probate was refused of a letter addressed by the deceased to a friend, directing the sale of stock in the public funds, and the distribution of the proceeds, on the ground that it referred to an immediate and not to a posthumous sale (w). And in another case, a paper addressed by a testator to his executors was held not to be testamentary, the same not being dispositive in terms, nor shewn by extrinsic evidence to have been so intended (x). In this case Sir Herbert Jenner observed that there was this distinction in the consideration of papers which are in their terms dispositive, and those which are of an equivocal character, that the first will be entitled to probate, unless, as in Nicholls v. Nicholls (y), they proved not to have been written animo testandi; whilst, in the latter, the animus must be proved by the party claiming under it.

But, as already observed, an instrument is not testamentary merely because actual enjoyment under it is postponed until after the donor's death. If it has present effect in fixing the terms of that future enjoyment, and therefore does not require the death of the alleged testator for its consummation, it is not a will. Therefore, where there was an agreement for a lease, which contained a provision for the distribution of the rent after the lessor's death among his grandchildren, of whom the lessee was one, it was held that this provision, being part of the consideration for which the lessee was to pay his rent, was irrevocable; it was therefore not testamentary (z). The Court was asked to grant probate only of a part of the document, namely, that which contained the provision in question: and as to this, Sir J. P. Wilde said he had met with no case where it had been done, although he by no means said it could not be done. And in fact, in the case (there cited) of Doe d. Cross v. Cross (a), where an instrument in the form of a power of attorney was given by a person abroad, whereby he appointed his mother to receive the rent of his lands for her own use, until he might return to England; or in the event of his death, he "thereby assigned and delivered to her the sole claim to his lands," but her occupancy was to cease on his return: this instrument was properly executed as a will, and was held to be a good will of the lands in question. The Court was clear that there was no objection to one part of an instrument operating in præsentia as a deed, and another in futuro as a will.

But the fact that the document is executed as a will, and that, either wholly or partially, it is to take effect after the donor's death, does not necessarily make it testamentary (b).

CHAPTER II.

Where property is given by will, and a trust affecting it is created de hors the will, the title of the cestui que trust is not testamentary (c).

Contingent wills.

IV.—Contingent, Joint, and Mutual Wills.—A will may be made so as to take effect only on a contingency (d), and if the contingency does not happen the will ought not to be admitted to probate (e). The contingency will generally attach to every part of the will, e.g., to a clause revoking former wills (f). But a codicil in other respects contingent will be admitted to probate, because it may operate as a republication of the will (g). A reference to some impending danger is common to most of these cases, and the question is whether the possible occurrence of the event is the reason for the particular disposition which the testator makes of his property, as where he says, "Should anything happen to me on my passage to W., I leave," &c. (h); or only the reason for making a will, as where he says, "In case of accident, being about to travel by railway, I bequeath," &c. (i). A will may also be made contingent on the assent of another person (j).

A will, intended to take effect as an exercise of a power, is not necessarily conditional on the existence of the power, if the testator has an interest independent of the power (k), or a power not expressly referred to (l), sufficient to support the disposition; for if an intention appears to dispose of the property, it matters not that the testator mistook the origin or nature of his dispositive pressions used by the testator must be such as clearly to indicate his intention that the will is only to take effect upon his death during a particular journey or period; if the expressions are equivocal, the will will not be regarded as conditional, but will be admitted to probate, though the journey or period has been completed: In bonis Mayd, 6 P. power. And if the testator has no interest, still the will may raise a case of election (m). CHAPTER II.

Where the will is in terms clearly contingent, and the contingency has failed, the will cannot either as to real estate (n), or, since the Wills Act, as to personal estate (o), be set up but by some act amounting to a re-execution of it (p). Without some such act it is a nullity, and a previous will stands unrevoked (q). When on the death of the testator the event is still in suspense, general probate will be granted at once (r). Of course the question still remains open what effect the will is to have.

Two or more persons may make a joint will, which, if properly executed by each, is, so far as his own property is concerned, as much his will, and is as well entitled to probate upon his death, as if he had made a separate will (s). But a joint will made by two persons, to take effect after the death of both, will not be admitted to probate during the life of either (t). Joint wills are revocable at any time by either of the testators during their joint lives, or, after the death of one of them, by the survivor (u). Joint will.

Mutual wills are recognised by the Roman Dutch law which is in force at the Cape of Good Hope, Ceylon, &c. A mutual will is regarded as being in effect two separate wills, in which the disposition of each testator is treated as applicable to his share of the joint property (v). Instruments of this nature are unknown to the testamentary law of this country (w), and with us the term "mutual will" is generally applied to the case of two persons making a will by which each leaves all his property to the other (x). A mutual compact by two persons to make testamentary dispositions in each other's favour is apparently enforceable in equity in some cases, as where the survivor accepts the benefits under Mutual wills.

far conclusive as to

V.—Effect of Probate.—“The granting of probate,” says Mr. Jarman (a), “is conclusive as to the testamentary character of the instrument in reference to personalty” (b). Everything included in the probate copy (c), but no word besides (d), must be taken by the Court of Construction to be part of the will, and the original will cannot be appealed to for the purpose of shewing that such copy is erroneous (e). Thus where probate was granted, with cross lines drawn over the bequests of certain legacies, Lord Cranworth held that it was to be taken as conclusively settled by the probate, that the will was at its execution in the state in which it was then found; i.e., that the testator had executed the instrument with the cross lines drawn over it (f). That being so, the only question for him to determine was, what did the instrument mean? and he thought the meaning was, that the testator’s original intention to give the legacies had ceased, and that he had placed the lines there to shew this. The result was that the legacies were struck out (g). Neither was it competent for the Court of Chancery, on the ground that legacies given by a

(b) “See Douglas v. Cooper, 3 My. & K. 378. The executors are considered as representing the legatees, in regard to the litigation respecting the validity of the will; and unless a case of fraud and collusion can be made out against them, the legatees are bound by the adjudication in the suit to which the executors are parties: Colvin v. Fraser, 2 Hagg. 292; Wood v. Medley, 1 Hagg. 645; Newell v. Weeks, 2 Phillim. 224; and that, too, though the same persons are executors under two conflicting testamentary instruments: Hayle v. Hasted, 1 Curt. 236. The Court, however, sometimes directs the parties interested to be brought before it: Reynolds v. Thrupp, 1 Curt. 570.”

[Note by Mr. Jarman.] But if the administration of the property is affected by a question as to the testator’s domicile, the executors are not deemed to represent the persons interested for the purpose of raising the question of domicile, and the decision of the Probate Court on that question will not bind the parties in a suit for the administration of the estate: Concha v. Concha, 11 App. Cas. 541.

(c) Gann v. Gregory, 3 D. M. & G. 777. Probate in facsimile was also granted in In bonis Raine, 34 L. J. P. 125, post, Chap. V.

(e) But the Court sometimes looks at the original will to see whether the punctuation or the mode in which it is written throws any light on its construction: post, p. 44. If the probate copy is erroneous, it ought to be sent back to the Court of Probate for rectification.

(f) The general presumption is that alterations in a will were made after its execution: see post, Chap. VII.; but that is for the consideration of the Court of Probate.

(g) Gann v. Gregory, 3 D. M. & G. 777.

codicil were fraudulently obtained, to declare the legatee a trustee for the person who would otherwise have taken. The objection on the ground of fraud should be taken in the Probate Court, which, on being satisfied of the fraud, would direct probate to issue, omitting that part containing the bequest complained of (h), or declaring that the legatees are trustees for the claimant (i). So if it is alleged that words have been inserted in the will by mistake, this can only be corrected by the Court of Probate (j). And practically this division of jurisdiction is continued as between the Chancery and Probate Divisions of the High Court of Justice (k), the judges of the former Division declining (in their discretion) to exercise the jurisdiction of the latter in matters of probate (l).

The Court of Probate Act, 1857 (m), gives to probate, after citation of the heir and other persons interested, and proof in solemn form, the same effect with regard to realty as it had before with regard to personalty (n). But the granting of probate in common form had no effect as regards real estate, either freehold or copyhold (o), except (under the Act of 1857) to furnish prima facie evidence of the validity and contents of the will (p).

Under the old law, a will disposing of real estate only was not entitled to probate (q) unless it appointed an executor, in which case it was entitled to probate (r); and if the executor renounced,

(m) 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, ss. 61, 62.

(n) To bring a will within the purview of this enactment, it must be one which both as to realty and personalty is to be tested by the same considerations. For if there were any difference between them, it would be absurd to enact that probate of one should be conclusive evidence of the validity of the other. Consequently it must be a will executed since and according to the stat. 1 Vict. c. 26: Campbell v. Lucy, L. R., 2 P. & D. 209. It is not necessary to cite the assignee of the heir; if the heir is a party, his assignee will be bound: Jones v. Jones, L. R., 7 P. D. 66.

a grant of administration with the will annexed would be made (s). But in the case of a testator who makes a will disposing of real estate (t) and dies since December 31, 1897, the real estate vests on his death in his personal representatives, and their assent is necessary to any devise contained in the will. In such a case, therefore, the will must be proved, and the Land Transfer Act, 1897, accordingly enacts that probate and administration may be granted in respect of real estate only, although there is no personal estate.

Limited effect of probate.

Even with respect to personal estate, the granting of probate of any paper has no other effect than to establish generally its claim to be received as testamentary (tt); and it remains for the Court of Construction to determine the meaning and effect of the instrument thus stamped with a testamentary character (u). The adjudication of this Court may, and often does, render the paper wholly nugatory. It may be found not to contain any intelligible disposition of the deceased's property (v), or to be in substance the same as or in substitution for another paper of which probate has been granted (w); or that its provisions are invalid according to the law of a foreign country, which constituted the domicile of the maker at the time of his decease (x); in all which cases the instrument so proved operates merely as an appointment of an executor, who distributes the property as under an intestacy.

examined by Court of Construction.

And to determine the construction, the original will, both of real and personal property, may be looked at (y). It was said, indeed, by Sir W. Grant (z), that his decision on the construction of the will before him could not depend on the grammatical skill of the writer, in the position of the characters expressive of a parenthesis: that it was from the words and from the context, not from the punctuation, that the sense must be collected. And there are, probably, few imaginable cases in which punctuation could exercise a very important influence upon the construction (a). But in recent times, the Courts have without hesitation adopted the practice of examining original wills "with a view to see whether anything there appearing,—as, for instance, the mode in which it was written, how 'dashed and stopped,'—could guide them in the true construction to be put upon it" (b). And where a will is in a foreign language, and the probate copy is a translation, the Court may look at the original will, or a copy of it, in order to ascertain its meaning (c).

Probate of the will of a married woman is now granted to her executor in the ordinary form without any exception or limitation (d). Formerly it was limited to property which she had power to dispose of and had disposed of, with administration cæterorum to the husband; and under the Judicature Act, 1873 (e), it was the duty of the Probate Division (so far as could properly and conveniently be done) to decide whether any particular fund was separate property or not (f). Formerly also if a married woman made a will by which she merely exercised a power of appointment, and appointed an executor, probate could not be granted (g). The present practice is based on the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (h); but is not confined to cases where the testatrix has the powers conferred by that Act. Whether proper course, however, seems to be to apply to the Court of Probate to correct the translation. In Steignes v. Steignes, Mos. 296, the word meubles in the original will was translated "moveables" in the probate copy, "by which," said the Solicitor-General, arguendo, "we must go": and the Court construed the will as if "moveables" had been the word used by the testator.

M. & G. 780 (already referred to), Lord Cranworth expressed his opinion that the will could not be looked at for the purpose of virtually reversing the decision of the Probate Court with respect to the form of the probate copy in question. In Re Wyatt, 4 T. L. R. 245, the Court referred to the original will for the purpose of supplying the name of an annuitant: it had been erased and was left blank in the probate copy.

she has or not any such powers the probate is conclusive, as regards the right of the executors to get in the assets, in the Chancery Division, but it does not alter the beneficial title of the husband to any property which the wife had no power to dispose of; the executors will hold such property in trust for the husband (i). If no executor is appointed and there is a partial intestacy, the husband is entitled to administration with the will annexed in preference to the next of kin of the testatrix (j).

Revocation
of probate.

If probate of an invalid will is granted in common form, the executor can sue for and give a good discharge for any debt due to the deceased (l). A WILL made during any personal disability is not rendered valid by the fact of the disability having been removed during the life of the testator, unless its removal has been followed by some act of confirmation or adoption amounting in law to re-execution of the will (a). Removal of disability after execution of will.

I.—Infancy.—At common law, infants of a certain age, namely, Old law. males of fourteen and females of twelve, were competent to dispose by will of personalty (b), and such a will was valid, although the testator or testatrix afterwards lived to attain majority without confirming it (c). In some places a custom existed enabling infants of a definite and reasonable age to devise real estate (d), but in the absence of such a custom infants were incompetent to dispose of real estate by will (e). Under the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 24, a father, even though an infant, could appoint guardians of his children by will.

The Wills Act, 1837, enacts (sect. 7) that no will made by any Present law. person under the age of twenty-one years shall be valid. And by the definition clause in the act this provision is extended to appointments of testamentary guardians under the Act of Charles II. or by mariners at sea, but with this exception (as to which see Chapter VI.) every will made by an infant is invalid.

"It may not be quite superfluous to remark," says Mr. Jarman (e), "that, in computing the age of a person for testamentary or other purposes, the day of his birth is included; thus, if he were born on the 16th of January, 1800, he would have attained his majority on the 15th of January, 1821 (f); and as the law does not recognise fractions of a day (g), the age would be attained at the first instant of the latter day."

Onus probandi.

II.—Insanity, Weakness of Mind, &c.—The general rule is "that the onus probandi lies in every case upon the party propounding a will, and he must satisfy the conscience of the Court that the instrument so propounded is the last will of a free and capable testator" (h). But if a will is rational on the face of it, and appears to be duly executed, it is presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to be valid (i).

Wills of idiots.

The will of an idiot is of course void (j). Mental imbecility arising from advanced age, or produced permanently or temporarily by excessive drinking, or any other cause, may destroy testamentary power (k).

Of persons deaf and blind.

"A person who has been from his nativity blind, deaf and dumb, is intellectually incapable of making a will, as he wants those senses through which ideas are received into the mind" (l). Blindness or deafness alone, however, produces no such incapacity. And it seems that a person born deaf and dumb, but not blind, though primâ facie incapable (m), may be shewn to have capacity, and to understand what is written down (n); and this of course applies more strongly to a person deaf and dumb from accident (o). Indeed, it has even been held that a will need not be read over to a blind testator previously to its execution, provided there be proof aliunde of a clear knowledge of the contents of the instrument (p); but it is almost superfluous to observe, that, in proportion as the infirmities of a testator expose him to deception, it becomes imperatively the duty, and should be anxiously the care, of all persons assisting in the testamentary transaction, to be prepared with the clearest proof that no imposition has been practised (q). This remark especially applies to wills executed by the inmates of lunatic asylums (r), or any other persons habitually or occasionally afflicted with insanity.

In cases of weakness of mind arising from the near approach of death, strong proof is required that the contents of the will were known to the testator (s), and that it was his spontaneous act (t). It is not, however, essential that the testator should at the time he signs the will be mentally competent to understand it: if while he is mentally competent he gives instructions for his will, and it is prepared in accordance with them, and at the time of signing it he understands that he is executing the will for which he had given instructions, the will is valid, although at the time of signing it he may not be able to understand its provisions in detail (u). On the other hand, a suspicion is justly entertained of a will conferring large benefits on the person by whom or by whose agent it was prepared (v), or of a will in favour of a medical attendant in whose house the testator resided (w); and the rule requiring strict proof is not confined to these cases, but extends to all cases in which circumstances exist which excite the suspicion of the Court (x).

Where undue influence has been exercised in obtaining gifts by will, the whole will is not necessarily void, but it will be left to the jury to determine what gifts were obtained by undue influence, and such gifts only will be declared void (y).

Mr. Jarman continues (yy), "A mad or lunatic person cannot, during the insanity of his mind, make a testament of land or goods; but if, during a lucid interval, he make a testament, it will be good (z). Lord Hardwicke has observed that fraud and imposition upon weakness may be a sufficient ground to set aside a will of real, much more a will of personal estate (sed quære as to this distinction?), although such weakness is not a sufficient ground for a commission of lunacy (a). And in Mountain v. Bennet (b), Lord C. B. Eyre laid it down, that although a man may have a mind of sufficient soundness and discretion to manage his affairs in general, yet if such a dominion or influence be obtained over him as to prevent his exercising that discretion in the making his will, he cannot be considered as having such a disposing mind as will give it effect. In this case the will was attempted to be invalidated on the ground that it was obtained by the undue influence of the testator's wife, whom he had married from an inferior station, but the will was finally supported, amidst much conflicting testimony as to the state of the testator's mind, principally on the evidence of the attesting witnesses, who were persons of high character and respectability, and were unanimous as to the testator's sanity and freedom from control.

"It appears, that though an inquisition finding a man a lunatic is primâ facie evidence of lunacy during the whole period covered by such inquisition, yet it does not preclude proof that the execution of a will, or any other act, occurred during a lucid interval (c).

"The principle is very ably stated by Sir W. Wynn in his judgment in Cartwright v. Cartwright (d): 'If you can establish that the party afflicted habitually by a malady of the mind has intermissions, and if there was an intermission of the disorder at the time of the act, that being proved, is sufficient, and the general habitual insanity will not affect it; but the effect of it is this—it inverts the order of proof and of presumption; for, until proof of habitual insanity is made, the presumption is, that the party, like all human creatures, was rational; but where an habitual insanity in the mind of the person who does the act is established, then the party who would take advantage of the fact of an interval of reason must prove it'" (e).

CHAPTER III.

intervals.

It has been laid down that the test of a person being of unsound mind in a legal sense is the existence of a delusion (f), or a belief in facts which an ordinary person would not credit, or a belief which one cannot understand how any person in his senses should hold; and that mere eccentricity of habits or perversion of feeling and conduct, forming what is termed moral insanity, do not constitute legal incapacity (g). General insanity must be distinguished from partial insanity or monomania. In case of the former, a lucid interval, a real absence at the time of making the will, of the disease itself, and not of its apparent delusions only, must be shewn (h). In case of the latter, opinions have differed. In Waring v. Waring (i), it was laid down by Lord Brougham, that it was incorrect to speak of partial insanity; that a mind unsound on one subject could not be called sound on any; and that unless a lucid interval (as explained above) could be shewn, testamentary incapacity was the necessary consequence, although the subject on which the unsoundness was manifested might be quite unconnected with the testamentary disposition in question. It is not perfect sanity, however, but only a mind that comprehends the testamentary act, that is required; and in Banks v.

CHAPTER III.

Goodfellow (j), Lord Brougham's doctrine, which it was observed was unnecessary to the decision of the cases in which it was stated, was rejected; and it was decided that monomania, which had not, and was not capable of having, any influence on the provisions of a will, did not destroy the capacity to make one; that the inquiry whether the monomania has or not had any such effect might be difficult, but was not impracticable; and that if, in the result, the Court was convinced that it had, the conclusion must be against the will. So, in Dew v. Clark (k), where the Prerogative Court was called upon to decide as to the testamentary capacity of a gentleman named Stott, an eminent medical electrician, who had an only child, against whom he had conceived a strong and groundless aversion, exhibited in a series of absurd acts of harshness and severity, and which he followed up by making a will in favour of some collateral relations, to the almost total exclusion of such only child; Sir J. Nicholl and the Court of Delegates successively pronounced against the validity of the will, after the delivery of very able and elaborate judgments, which should be perused by all inquirers into this interesting subject (l). And a like decision was made in the somewhat similar case of Boughton v. Knight (m).

Religious delusions.

Beliefs connected with religious subjects may amount to delusions which prove testamentary incapacity (n). But the fact that a person believes himself to be commanded by the Deity to carry out some particular work, does not of itself prove that he entertains delusions which incapacitate him from making a valid will (o).

Lord Thurlow is said to have intimated an opinion, that where lunacy is once established by clear evidence, the party ought to be restored to as perfect a state of mind as he had before; but Lord Eldon expressed his dissent from this notion (p).

Where there is a question as to the testamentary capacity of a

CHAPTER III.

III.—Coverture under the Old Law.—Before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, a married woman was generally, subject to the exceptions to be presently noticed, incapable of making a valid testamentary disposition of real or personal property. And, inasmuch as the former law in this respect holds good with regard to all property acquired before 1883 by a woman married before that date (r), the pre-existing law still requires consideration.

Disability of
under the old law.

A married woman subject to the old law cannot dispose by will of the legal estate in freehold land except by the exercise of a power of appointment (s). And such a power, if given to her by a marriage settlement, and thereby made exercisable during coverture, may be exercised by her during any subsequent coverture (t). In the case of copyholds, a married woman can devise lands which she has surrendered (after separate examination and with the consent of her husband) to the use of her will, but a surrender made by an unmarried woman to the use of her will is suspended during her subsequent coverture (u). A married woman can dispose of an equitable fee simple or other interest in land, whether freehold or copyhold, if it belongs to her for her separate use (v), and it is immaterial that the legal estate is not vested in trustees, since the husband, and all persons on whom the legal estate may devolve, are deemed trustees for the persons to whom the wife has given the equitable interest (w).

Land.

In Re Currey (x), Chitty, J., expressed the opinion that a restraint on anticipation does not prevent a married woman from disposing by will of property given to her separate use.

CHAPTER III.

Ante-nuptial contract.

It seems also that a contract before marriage as to specified lands is sufficient to give the wife an equitable power to devise them (y), but a mere renunciation by the husband of his marital rights in respect of his wife's real property is not sufficient to give her a testamentary power (z).

Personalty.

A married woman subject to the old law can make a valid will of personalty in pursuance of an agreement before marriage, or of an agreement made after marriage for consideration (a), or if the husband assents to the particular will, either before or after her death, and survives her (b). Formerly, if the husband proved her will in general form, the probate operated as an assent, but since the alteration in the practice with regard to the probate of married women's wills, this is no longer so (c).

Power of appointment.

A married woman subject to the old law can dispose of personal property over which she has an absolute power of appointment by will, notwithstanding coverture (d), but if she has a power of appointment exercisable only in the event of her dying during the lifetime of her husband, a will made in exercise of the power is inoperative if she survives him (e), unless of course it is republished (f).

Separate use.

A married woman subject to the old law can also dispose by will of personal property belonging to her for her separate use (g). And

D. 194), property was held upon trust for a married woman for her separate use for life, with a power of appointment by deed or will if she died during her husband's lifetime, and if she survived him, upon trust for her, her executors, administrators, and asit is immaterial that the property is not expressly vested in trustees for her (h). If the separate use applies to the corpus or principal, it attaches on all the produce or accumulations of such principal (i). Savings out of an allowance made by a husband for the separate maintenance of his wife are in equity treated as her separate estate (j); of which, therefore, she may dispose by will. But savings out of pin-money are said to belong to the husband (k); on the principle that pin-money is an allowance made for a particular purpose, and, if not applied for that purpose, reverts to the donor.

CHAPTER III.

Savings out of main-tenance.

Pin-money.

The separate use may, however, be limited to the income of the property, whether real or personal, so as not to apply to the corpus (l), and then of course she cannot, under the old law, dispose of the corpus by will.

Separate use attaching to income and not to corpus.

And under the old law a woman might, while discover, deal with the corpus of property settled to her separate use in such a way as to put an end to the separate use (m).

Extinguish-ment of separate use.

The opinion of Chitty, J. (n), that a restraint on anticipation does not prevent a married woman from disposing by will of property belonging to her for her separate use, has been already referred to.

signs for her separate use; she made a will during coverture in exercise of the power, and survived her husband: it was held by Malins, V.-C., on the authority of Taylor v. Meads (4 D. J. & S. 597), that the will was a good disposition of the property: sed quære.

CHAPTER III.

Judicial separation
tion orders.

A woman who has been deserted by her husband, and has obtained a protection order, can effectually by her will dispose of property acquired by her during the desertion, and the order has a retrospective operation, relating back to the commencement of the desertion (o). But the husband may claim to set aside the will if he can shew that the order was obtained by fraud (p). Under the same act (Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857) a woman who has obtained a judicial separation is thenceforward in the position of a feme sole, and so is a woman who has obtained a separation order under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895.

Wife of an

alien enemy.

A woman, whose husband had been banished for life by Act of Parliament (q), may dispose by will of her real and personal estate; for, as he was civilly defunct, she is restored to the rights and privileges of discoveriture. This doctrine was held to be applicable to the case of a felon-convict transported for life, so as to enable his wife to dispose by will of personalty acquired by her after the conviction (r), although the felon had received a conditional free pardon (s); and when a felon was transported for a definite term of years, his marital rights (and therefore it would seem his wife's conjugal disabilities) were suspended for that period (t).

It was suggested in Deerly v. Duchess of Mazarine (u), that the wife of an alien enemy was in the same position as the wife

In the latter case sentence of death had been recorded, so that the felon was attainted, and being thus dead in the eye of the law, was incapable of claiming jure mariti: per Wood, V.-C., in Gough v. Davies, 2 K. & J. 627, where Newsome v. Bowyer, 3 P. W. 37, is referred to. However, the Court did not take this ground, but relied expressly on Ex parte Franks, 1 M. & Sc. 11, 7 Bing. 762, where the felon was transported for a term of years. See also Atlee v. Hook, 23 L. J. Ch. 776 (where a legacy bequeathed, after the conviction, to the wife of a felon transported for life, but so far as appears not attainted, was ordered to be paid to her); and per Romilly, M. (s) Under 5 Geo. 4, c. 84, s. 26, a convict was entitled to retain against the Crown and to recover in the Courts of the United Kingdom personalty acquired by him after receiving such a pardon: *Gough v. of a person banished ; but the point is now of no practical interest, as the disabilities of aliens have been abolished.

CHAPTER III.

Except in these cases, however, a married woman was under the old law unable to make a valid testamentary disposition of property. Consequently a will made by a married woman during coverture was inoperative to pass property to which she became entitled on or after her husband's death, unless she re-executed or republished it after the determination of the coverture (v). So that if property was given upon such trusts as a married woman should during coverture by will appoint, and if she survived her husband upon trust for her absolutely, and she made a will during coverture exercising the power, and survived her husband, the will was inoperative (w).

Will of feme covert surviving husband.

But a married woman who is an executrix could always by will appoint an executor to carry on the administration of the estate of the original testator (x).

Will of executrix.

Although a married woman under the old law may have no power to make a will, it seems that she may by "writing," under sect. 20 of the Wills Act, revoke one made while discover (y).

Feme covert may revoke a will.

IV.—Married Women's Property Act, 1882.—In this state of the law the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, was passed (z). Its material clauses are the following:—Sect. 1 (1). "A married woman shall, in accordance with the provisions of this act, be capable of acquiring, holding and disposing by will or otherwise of any real or personal estate as her separate property in the same manner as if she were a feme sole without the intervention of any trustee." Sect. 2. "Every woman who marries after the commencement of this act (a) shall be entitled to have and to hold as her separate property, and to dispose of in manner aforesaid, all real and personal property which shall belong to her at the time of marriage or shall be acquired by or devolve upon her after marriage, including any wages, earnings," &c. Sect. 5. "Every woman married before the commencement of this act shall be entitled to have and to hold, and to dispose of in manner aforesaid as her separate property, all real and personal property, her title to which, whether vested or contingent, and whether in possession, reversion, or remainder, shall accrue after the commencement of this act, including wages," &c.

Act does not give general testamentary capacity.

Sect. 1 is a general or introductory section, which gives the keynote to the subsequent detailed sections of the act; it does not confer on married women any general testamentary power. It therefore does not enable a woman married before the commencement of the act to dispose of property by will, unless it was acquired by her after the commencement of the act, and during the coverture (c). But where a married woman having powers of appointment and separate estate, and having, therefore, capacity to make a will, made a will before the commencement of the act, containing a residuary gift, this was held to pass separate property which she acquired under the provisions of the act (d).

When title accrues.

If a woman married before January 1, 1883, was at that date entitled to property contingently or in reversion, her title to it has already "accrued," and it does not "accrue," so as to make the property her separate property under sect. 5, by falling into possession after the commencement of the act (e). And the same rule applies where reversionary property is converted from realty into personalty by being sold under a power of sale before the reversion falls into possession (f). On the other hand, where a testator who died in 1879 bequeathed property to the persons who should be his next of kin in 1886, the title of a married woman who formed one of the class thus ascertained was held to accrue at the latter date (g).

Property acquired after coverture.

On the principle already mentioned, it was held that the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, did not enable a married woman, by will made during coverture, to dispose of property which vested in her after her husband's death; to have this operation, her will had to be republished after the determination of the coverture (h).

The Married Women's Property Act, 1893.

And now by the Married Women's Property Act, 1893 (s. 3), it is enacted that sect. 24 of the Wills Act, 1837 (which makes a will speak from the death of the testator), shall apply to the will of a married woman made during coverture, whether she is or is not possessed of or entitled to any separate property at the time of making it, and that such will shall not require to be re-executed or republished after the death of her husband.

This enactment applies to the will of any married woman dying after December 5, 1893, although the will may have been made before that date (i).

It has been decided that the general disposing power given to married women by the act does not enable them to devise land for the erection of churches under stat. 43 Geo. 3, c. 108 (j).

Gifts for Churches Act, 1803.

Apparently a married woman has no power to devise land vested in her as sole trustee, even if it was conveyed to her since 1882. But by virtue of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, or the Conveyancing Act, 1881, land vested in a married woman as sole trustee devolves on her death to her personal representative (k).

Trust estates.

V.—Aliens.—At common law, a devise of lands by an alien was at least voidable (l); the crown being entitled, after office found, to seize them in the hands of the devisee, as it might have done in those of the alien during his life. Until office, the lands of an alien remained in him with all the incidental qualities belonging to such estates; on which ground it has been held, that an alien tenant in tail in possession might suffer a common recovery (m): and he might, of course, execute its substitute, an enrolled conveyance, and thereby bar the issue in tail and remainders; and, by parity of reasoning, the will of an alien vested his defeasible title in the devisee (n); though, if he died intestate, the land escheated to the Crown, or other lord, pro defectu tenentis, without any inquest of office, because an alien could have no heirs (o). But by the Naturalisation Act, 1870 (p), “real and personal property of every description may be taken, acquired, held, and disposed of by an alien in the same manner as by a natural-born British subject; and a title to real and personal property of every description may be derived through, from, or in succession to an alien in the same manner in all respects as through, from, or in succession to a natural-born British subject.

Provided that . . . this section shall not affect (q) any estate or interest in real or personal property to which any person has or may become entitled either mediately or immediately in possession or expectancy in pursuance of any disposition made before the Act, or in pursuance of any devolution by law on the death of any person dying before the act."

traitors and felons;
—realty.

VI.—Traitors and Felons.—Persons attainted of high treason were formerly incompetent to devise their lands, since, by several old statutes (r), the real estates of a traitor were, by the attainder, ipso facto vested in the Crown.

The lands of all persons attainted for petit treason and felony, formerly escheated to the king or other feudal lord (s), by reason of the corruption of blood consequent on attainder, which of course prevented the descent to the heir; and the devises of such persons were absolutely void, or rather, by the better opinion, were voidable, as in the case of an alien (t); and such until 1870 was still the case as to persons not entitled to the benefit of the statute 54 Geo. 3, c. 145, which provided, that no attainder for felony, except in cases of high treason, or of the crimes of petit treason (afterwards abolished by statute (u)), or murder, or of abetting, procuring, or counselling the same, "shall extend to the disinheriting of any heir, nor to the prejudice of the right or title of any person or persons, other than the right or title of the offender or offenders, during his, her, or their natural lives only; and that it shall be lawful to every person or persons to whom the right or interest of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, after the death of any such offender or offenders, should or might have appertained, if no such attainder had been, to enter into the same."

There was some ground to contend, that the concluding words of this provision enabled persons convicted of, or rather attainted for, any other than the excepted offences, to alien their real estate by will, and this ground was strengthened by the statutes (v), which in all cases where a title had accrued to the Crown by escheat for want of heirs, or by reason of any forfeiture, empowered the sovereign (notwithstanding the statute (w) which had restrained the alienation of the royal demesnes in general to leases for thirty-one years) to make grants to any person for the purpose of restoring the land to the family of the former owner, or carrying into effect any grant, conveyance or devise of it which he might have intended to make.

But the point is now of less importance, since, by stat. 33 & 34 Vict. c. 23, attainder (which, and not the conviction, caused the disability) is thenceforth abolished, and express provisions (presently noticed) are made regarding the real estate both of traitors and felons.

Treason and felony incapacitated persons from making a will of personal estate, which, if vested (either in possession or remainder), became forfeited to the Crown on conviction (x); and this incapacity extended to a felo de se, who was, however, capable of devising his real estate, as there was in such case no attainder (y). In every case of felony in which sentence of death was not recorded, that is to say, in which there was no attainder, the prisoner's competency to devise or otherwise dispose of his real estate was not affected (z).

But the law as to both real and personal property is now regulated by the Forfeiture Act, 1870, which enacts (sect. 1) that after the passing of it, “ no confession, verdict, inquest, conviction, or judgment of or for any treason, or felony, or felo de se, shall cause any attainder or corruption of blood, or any forfeiture or escheat ; provided that nothing in this act shall affect the law of forfeiture consequent on outlawry ” (a). The statute then, after defining (sect. 6) “ convict ” to mean any person against whom sentence of death, or of penal servitude, shall have been pronounced or recorded upon any charge of treason or felony ; and after providing (sect. 7) that when any convict shall die, or become bankrupt, or shall have suffered his punishment, original or commuted, or have been pardoned, he shall thenceforth, as to the provisions thereafter contained, cease to be subject to the act,

CHAPTER III. enacts (sect. 8) that no action or suit for the recovery of any property shall be brought by any convict during the time that he is subject to the act, and that every convict shall be incapable during that time of alienating or charging any property, or of making any contract, save as thereafter provided. Sect. 9 gives the Crown power to appoint an administrator, in whom, upon his appointment, (sect. 10) all the real and personal property (including choses in action) to which the convict was at the time of his conviction, or shall afterwards, while subject to the act, become or be entitled, and which, until such appointment, remains in the convict (b), vests for all the convict's estate and interest. And the administrator has full power (sect. 12) to let, sell, and mortgage the property, and thereout (sects. 13 to 17) to pay costs, debts, damages, &c., and to make allowances for the support of the convict and his family. Subject thereto, the administrator is (sect. 18) to hold the property in trust, and may accumulate the income, for the benefit of the convict and his heirs, or legal personal representatives, or such other persons as may be lawfully entitled thereto, according to the nature thereof; and the same is to revest in the convict on his ceasing to be subject to the act, or in his heirs or representatives, or such other persons as may be lawfully entitled thereto. The convict is to be entitled as against the administrator to all property acquired by him while at large under licence, and, during the same time, his disabilities under sect. 8 are suspended (sect. 30).

Subject, therefore, to the temporary estate of the administrator, and to the charges imposed by the act, the real and personal property of a traitor or felon remains his own, and he may apparently dispose of it by his will; for the prohibition against alienation during the time that he is subject to the act, can have no application to his will, whensoever executed; a will being no alienation until the testator's death.

I.—Preliminary.—Personal property (including chattels real) passes on the death of the owner to his personal representatives, who are bound to satisfy his debts and liabilities before distributing the estate. Every legatee takes subject to this obligation, and his title to the property bequeathed to him is not complete until the executors have assented to the bequest. In the case of estates of inheritance in land, the rule was formerly different, for a devise of land operated as a conveyance to the devisee (a). This rule was broken into by the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, which (by sect. 4) gave the legal personal representatives of a deceased mortgagee of land power to reconvey it on redemption, and (by sect. 5) on the death of a person seised (b) of any hereditaments in fee simple as a bare trustee, made them pass to his personal representatives. This latter section was repealed by sect. 48 of the Land Transfer Act, 1875, and it was enacted that from January 1, 1876, on the death of a bare trustee intestate as to any hereditament of which he was seised in fee simple, it should vest like a chattel real in his legal personal representative from time to time. All these enactments have been repealed, and new provisions have been enacted by sect. 30 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and sect. 88 of the Copyhold Act, 1894; the result is that in the case of any person dying since December 31, 1881, all hereditaments vested in him solely on any trust or by way of mortgage for an estate of inheritance (other than copyholds of which he is tenant on the Court rolls), devolve to his personal representatives like a chattel real, notwithstanding any testamentary disposition made by him (c). Another exception to the general rule was introduced by sect. 4 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, which enacts that where at the death of a person there is subsisting a contract enforceable against his heir or devisee for the sale of land, his personal representatives can convey it so as to give effect to the contract.

Land Transfer Act, 1897.

As to freehold land which is held by a person as beneficial owner, it has now been placed on practically the same footing as personal estate, so far as its devolution to the personal representatives of the deceased owner is concerned, for sect. 1 of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, provides as follows : “ (i.) Where real estate is vested in any person without a right in any other person to take by survivorship, it shall on his death (d), notwithstanding any testamentary disposition, devolve to and become vested in his personal representatives or representative from time to time as if it were a chattel real vesting in them or him (e). (ii.) This section shall apply to any real estate over which a person executes by will a general power of appointment as if it were real estate vested in him. (iii.) Probate and letters of administration may be granted in respect of real estate only, although there is no personal estate. (iv.) The expression ‘ real estate ’ in this part of this act shall not be deemed to include land of copyhold tenure or customary freehold in any case in which an admission or any act by the lord of the manor is necessary to perfect the title of a purchaser from the customary tenant (f). (v.) This section applies only in cases of death after the commencement of this act,” namely, January 1, 1898 (g). Sect. 2 provides in effect that, subject to the payment of debts, &c., the personal representatives shall hold the real estate as trustees

(c) As to the operation of this section, see Chap. XXV.

(d) According to John v. John, [1898] 2 Ch. 573, before probate the land passes to the heir : sed quære : the act does not expressly abrogate the old rule, under which a devisee takes by virtue of the will.

(f) The act applies to equitable interests in copyholds : Re Somerville and Turner's Contract, [1903] 2 Ch. 583.

(g) Part I. of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, is one of the worst-drawn enactments of modern times. Some of the difficulties arising from its obscure wording are referred to in Brickdale and Sheldon's Land Transfer Acts, and Robbins and Mawe on the Devolution of Real Estate.

for the persons beneficially entitled thereto (h), and that those persons shall have the same power of requiring a transfer of real estate as persons beneficially entitled to personal estate have of requiring a transfer of such personal estate. Sect. 3 provides that at any time after the death of the owner of any land his personal representatives may assent to any devise contained in his will, or may convey the land to any person entitled thereto as heir, devisee or otherwise, and may make the assent or conveyance subject to a charge for the payment of any money which the personal representatives are liable to pay (i). The result seems to be that if they assent to a devise, the legal estate in the land vests in the devisee without a conveyance. The act does not require an assent to be in writing (j). A written assent does not require a stamp (k).

assent.

The better opinion seems to be that the effect of the act is that the personal representatives of a deceased person are trustees of his real estate for the persons beneficially entitled thereto as from his death, and not, as in the case of personal estate, from the time when they have fully administered (l).

II.—What may be devised or bequeathed.—Sect. 3 of the Wills Act enacts that “it shall be lawful for every person to devise, bequeath or dispose of by his will, executed in manner hereinafter required, all real estate and all personal estate which he shall be entitled to, either at law or in equity, at the time of his death, and which, if not so devised, bequeathed or disposed of, would devolve upon the heir at law or customary heir of him (m), or if he became entitled by descent, of his ancestor, or upon his executor or administrator.” The section contains detailed provisions which will be referred to in the course of this chapter.

It will be remembered that under sect. 30 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, a devise of trust or mortgage estates is in general wholly inoperative.

(h) These words (coupled with the reference to “testamentary dispositions” in s. 1) seem to shew that Part I. of the act was not meant to apply to trust and mortgage estates, and that these continue to be subject to s. 30 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, post, Chap. XXV. As to the effect of s. 2 on devises to trustees, see post, Chap. XLVI.

CHAPTER IV.

Joint estates and interests.

Tried by the rule laid down by sect. 3 of the Wills Act, it is obvious that a devise or bequest by a joint tenant of real or personal estate is void, in the event of the testator dying in the lifetime of his co-proprietor, whose title by survivorship takes precedence of the claim of the devisee or legatee, as it would of that of the heir or administrator, of the predeceased joint tenant, in case he had died intestate (n). If, on the other hand, the testator survives his companion in the tenancy, it is now (o) unnecessary to inquire whether the devising joint tenant had become solely seised by survivorship at the period of the execution of his will; it is enough that he had acquired a devisable interest in the estate at the time of his decease. And the same rule applies now, as formerly, to bequests of leaseholds or other personal estate.

common and coparceners.

"Where the several co-proprietors are tenants in common, or coparceners, each has an absolute power of testamentary disposition over his or her undivided share" (oo).

Dead body.

It is obvious that a person cannot dispose by will of anything that is not the subject of ownership or property, such as his own body after death (p).

hold interests
devisable.

III.—Freehold Land.—Mr. Jarman says (pp): "A will disposing of any interest in real estate of which the testator was seised, operated, under the old law, in the nature of a conveyance, and, consequently, extended only to hereditaments belonging to the testator when he made the devise (q). This rule was early established, in relation as well to devises by custom, as to devises under the statutes of Henry VIII. which shews that it did not (as commonly supposed) arise from the mode of penning those statutes, but resulted from principles common to both species of devises. As equity follows the law, the doctrine extended no less to equitable than to legal interests. If, therefore, a testator before the year 1838 devised all the real estate of which he should be seised at the time of his decease, and after the making of his will he purchased lands in fee simple, such after-acquired property, whether it was conveyed to the testator himself, or to a trustee for him, did not pass by the will, but descended, as to the legal inheritance in the former case, and as to the equitable inheritance in the latter, to the testator's heir at law (r).

(n) Co. Litt. 185a. Such a disposition would not work a severance. The power of devising is given by 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 3, only where the property, if not devised, would go to the heir. As to property transferred by a husband into the joint names of himself and his wife, see Dummer v. Pitcher, 2 M. & K. 262; Coates v. Stevens, 1 Y. & C. Ex. 66; *Grosvenor v. (q) It seems, however, that if a man devised a remainder or reversion, and afterwards acquired the particular estate, the devise carried the estate thus acquired, the ulterior estate being accelerated by merger: Buckenham v. Cook, Holt, 248.

“Where a testator had an equitable interest in the devised lands when he made his will, and afterwards acquired the legal ownership, the equitable interest passed by the will, and the subsequently acquired legal estate descended to the heir, who, of course, became a trustee for the devisee. If, on the other hand, the testator was seised only of the legal estate at the time of the execution of his will, and afterwards acquired the equitable interest (being the converse case), as where, being a mortgagee in fee at the date of the will, he subsequently purchased the equity of redemption, the devisee was a trustee of the legal estate which he derived through the will, for the heir at law to whom the equitable inheritance descended (s). Cases of the former description frequently occurred, where a man contracted to purchase a freehold estate, then devised it, and, subsequently to the execution of his will, took a conveyance of the property, and then died without republishing his will (t). The testator being equitable owner under the contract (u), his interest passed by the will to the devisee, whose equitable right the heir was bound to clothe with the legal title. In these and many other cases, great inconvenience occurred from the incompetency of a testator to dispose by will of his after-acquired real estate; and questions often arose as to the actual state of the rights and obligations of the parties under the contract, on which the validity of the devise depended (w), and also as to the effect of certain modes of conveyance, in producing a revocation of the devise of the equitable interest. The removal of this incapacity, therefore, is not the least of the advantages conferred by the recent statute [the Wills Act, 1837], which has expressly extended the testamentary power to such real and personal estate as the testator may be entitled to at the time of his death, notwithstanding he may become entitled to the same subsequently to the execution of his will. But it may, of course, be necessary, even under the present law, to go into the inquiry, whether the circumstances attending a contract for purchase or sale by a deceased person are such as to render the contract obligatory, for upon this fact would depend the question (which has lost none of its importance by the recent enactment) whether, as between the representatives of the deceased testator or intestate, it is to be regarded as real or personal estate." This question is discussed in the chapter on Conversion.

The Wills Act not only (by sect. 3) extends the power of testamentary disposition to all real estate which the testator is entitled to at the time of his death, but (by sect. 24) makes every will speak from the time of the testator's death, unless a contrary intention appears. The effect of these sections is discussed in chapters XII. and XXVI.

Devises of copyholds.

IV.—Copyholds.—(a) Old Law.—By the common law, copyholds could not be devised except by virtue of a special custom of the manor of which they were held, nor were they affected by the Statutes of Wills passed in the reign of Henry VIII. (x). When a copyholder wished to devise his copyhold, it was originally necessary that he should make a surrender to the use of his last will; the estate then passed by the surrender and not by the will, which was only a direction of the uses of the surrender (y). The surrender, and not the will, being the operative part, so to speak, of the devise, one joint tenant could, by surrendering to the use of his will, and then devising to a stranger, sever the jointure (z), and, in most manors, also bar his widow of freebench. By the statute 55 Geo. III., c. 192, all devises thereafter to be made of copyhold lands, though not surrendered to the use of the testator's will, were rendered as valid as if a surrender had been made (a).

An equitable interest in copyholds under a trust or right of redemption, or a contract for purchase, being incapable of surrender, was devisable without any such formality, and it was immaterial in the last case that a surrender had been made to the use of the purchaser, so long as he had not been admitted (b) : and the right of the equitable owner to devise his interest could not be controlled by the custom of the manor (c).

Customary freeholds, though not held at the will of the lord, yet if alienable by surrender and admittance, were devisable in the same manner as copyholds (d).

Mr. Jarman remarks (e) that : " Copyholds, equally with freeholds, were subject to the rule, which, under the old law, restricted a devise to lands of which the testator was seised when he made his will (f). A devise of copyholds, therefore, however comprehensive in its terms, did not generally pass an after-acquired copyhold estate (g), except so far as such estate might have been brought within its operation by a subsequent surrender to the use of the will (formerly a necessary accompaniment of a devise of copyholds), which surrender was construed to have the effect of extending a general devise of copyholds to lands acquired in the interval between the will and the surrender (g) ; and it was decided that a surrender to such uses as the testator ' shall ' by will appoint applied to a will

(a) See Doe d. Hickman v. Hickman, 4 B. & Ad. 56 : Doe v. Bartle, 5 B. & Ald. 492, 1 D. & Ry. 81. C. 117 ; Pike v. White, ib. 287 ; but see 1 Evans' Stat. p. 450. At all events, such a custom will not be presumed from the fact that no entry is to be found on the Court rolls of any such surrender : Doe d. Edmunds v. Llewellyn, 2 C. antecedently executed, it being considered that the surrenderor referred to that will which should be in existence at his death (h).

"And here it may be observed, that as every copyhold is parcel of the manor to which it belongs, a devise of the manor was held to comprise such copyholds, though acquired by the lord after the making of his will" (i).

Devise by devisee or surrenderee of copyholds before admittance void.

Devise by an unadmitted heir held to be good.

Under the old law, too, a devisee or surrenderee of copyholds before admittance was wholly incapable of devising them (j). The same doctrine was at one period considered to apply to an heir, on the supposed authority of Smith v. Triggs (k); but, as such, the decision in that case was completely overruled by Right d. Taylor v. Banks (l). The point was again raised, and received a similar determination, in King v. Turner (m) and Doe d. Perry v. Wilson (n).

Devises of copyholds under Wills Act.

(b) Present Law.—The Act 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 3, has precluded any question of this nature in regard to wills which are subject to its operation. It repeals stat. 55 Geo. III, c. 192, which only supplied the omission of a formal surrender (o), and makes the will itself, without any surrender, confer a right to admittance (p), notwithstanding that the testator has not surrendered to the use of his will, or notwithstanding that the copyholds, in consequence of the want of a custom to devise or surrender to the use of a will or otherwise, or in consequence of there being a custom that a will or surrender to the use of a will should continue in force for a limited time only, or any other special custom, could not have been disposed of by the will previously to the passing of the act. It also expressly affirms the testamentary power of an unadmitted heir, and extends the devising power to an unadmitted devisee or surrenderee. Thus all questions arising under the former act respecting the validity of a devise, in consequence of the power to devise being still left dependent on the power to surrender to the use of the will (though the surrender itself was not required), are now set at rest. But in Lacey v. Hill (q), it was held that the Wills Act does not merely dispense with the surrender and the custom, but gives the devise the same effect as if there actually had been both; and that consequently a general devise of the testator's "real estate," without more, bars his widow of her freebench. Reading the act, Sir G. Jessel, M. R., said: "That means that a testator is to have the same power of devising copyhold estate, as if he had done all the things there mentioned; as if there had been a surrender, or as if there had been a custom, and so forth. It breaks in upon the customary law of copyholds for the purpose of giving an unlimited power of devise. I am of opinion that the same effect is to be given to a devise of copyholds under the new law, as under the law as it stood before the Wills Act, and consequently the widow is not entitled to freebench." It is to be presumed that in this case the custom gave freebench of lands of which the copyholder was seised at his death, and not, as is the custom in some manors (r), of those of which he was seised at any time during the coverture; since, in the latter case, notwithstanding a custom to surrender to the use of the will, neither a devise nor an actual surrender by the husband would under the previous law have barred the freebench (s).

Copyholders also participate in the benefit of the enactments which extend the devising power to after-acquired real estate, and other interests not before devisable; and are, on the other hand, bound by those which (as we shall see) regulate the ceremonial of execution. Copyholds are also, in common with freeholds, subject to the several clauses by which the legislature has propounded certain new canons or rules of construction, which in general appear to be of a nature to admit of application to copyhold estates.

of the manor is necessary to perfect the title of a purchaser from the customary tenant" is excluded from sect. 1 of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, and consequently a devise of such land gives the devisee a title independent of the executors (u). Equitable interests in copyholds and customary freeholds are "real estate" within sect. 1 (v).

V.—Chattels Real.—Bequests of chattel interests in land (w) were always governed by principles wholly different from those which formerly regulated devises of freehold estates. Even under the old law they did not, as Mr. Jarman points out (x), "pass directly to the legatee, as the alienee of the testator, but, forming part of his personal estate, they devolve to the executor or other general personal representative, who is bound, in subordination to the paramount claims of creditors, to give effect to any bequest in the will, specific or residuary, comprising the property in question; and, therefore, even under the old law, it was quite unnecessary, as regarded the testator's competency of disposition, to go into the inquiry, whether he was, at the time of making the will, possessed of a term of years which formed part of his property at his decease (y); such an inquiry being no less irrelevant in the case of a bequest of leaseholds held by a chattel lease, than in that of a horse or a watch, or any other personal chattel."

pur auter vie.

VI.—Estates pur auter vie (z).—Mr. Jarman continues (a): "Freeholds pur auter vie require a distinct consideration in connection with the testamentary power. This species of estate stands distinguished from all other interests, freehold or chattel, by this peculiar quality, that it is capable of being rendered transmissible to either real or personal representatives, according to the terms of the instrument creating the estate, or rather the instrument vesting it in the deceased owner, or in the person under whom he derived his title by act of law: for it seems now to be admitted that the devolution of the estate is regulated by the words of limitation contained in the last conveyance, without regard to the mode of its original creation. Estates pur auter vie are devisable by the express terms of the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. II., c. 3 (s. 12), the Act of Henry VIII. being (according to the prevalent and probably the better opinion) confined to estates of inheritance in fee simple" (b).

Though the Statute of Frauds required three witnesses to the devise of an estate pur auter vie, yet where the property devolved otherwise than to the heirs of the owner (i.e., where it was limited either to his executors or administrators, or to the last taker indefinitely, without any express mention of either class of representative), it was distributable as part of his personal estate, whether he died testate or intestate; and by a necessary consequence of this principle, an executor taking it as such was bound to give effect to any bequest or direction in the will affecting such property, though the will might not have been attested in the manner required by the statute in question (c). By the Wills Act, s. 3, the previous enactments respecting estates pur auter vie were repealed, and the testamentary power is expressly extended to such estates, "whether there shall or shall not be any special occupant thereof, and whether the same shall be freehold, customary freehold, tenant right, customary or copyhold, or of any other tenure, and whether the same shall be a corporeal or an incorporeal hereditament"; and by sect. 6 it is enacted, that if no disposition shall be made of any estate pur auter vie of a freehold nature, it shall be assets in the hands of the heir, and that in case there shall be no special occupant of any estate pur auter vie, whether freehold or customary freehold, tenant right, customary, or copyhold, or of any other tenure, and whether a corporeal or incorporeal hereditament, it shall go to the executor or administrator of the party that had the estate thereof by virtue of the grant; and if the same shall come to the executor or administrator, either by reason of a special occupancy or by virtue of the act, it shall be assets in his hands, and shall go and be applied and distributed in the same manner as the personal estate of the testator or intestate (d).

Transfer Act,

quasi tenant in tail of estates pur

Sect. 1 of the Land Transfer Act, 1897 (quoted above, p. 64), clearly includes estates pur auter vie, even where there is a special occupant.

Mr. Jarman said in the first edition of this work (e): "A question often agitated, but never entirely settled, in regard to the devising power over estates of this description, was whether, where they were limited to the tenant pur auter vie, and the heirs of his body, they could be devised without some act on his part to bar the entail. It was admitted on all hands that if the property were undisposed of, it would devolve to the heir special per formam doni; it was equally clear that an alienation by deed (f) was an effectual bar to the entail; but the doubt was, whether the estate was devisable by will alone, without any such previous alienation. The authorities on the point are few and contradictory. In Doe v. Luxton (g), Lord Kenyon inclined to think that the devise was good; but this dictum stands opposed to that of Lord Redesdale in Campbell v. Sandys (h); and to the decision of Lord Manners in the case of Dillon v. Dillon (i), who held that a quasi tenant in tail of an estate pur auter vie could not by devise exclude the title of remainderman, and such was evidently the impression of Sir T. Plumer in Blake v. Luxton (j). The recent statute [1 Vict. c. 26] does not in terms dispose of this debateable point, but has, it should seem, done so in effect, by the language of the general enabling clause, sect. 3, which extends the devising power to 'all real estate and all personal estate which he (the testator) shall be entitled to, either at law or in equity, at the time of his death, and which, if hold for his own benefit, unless the will be such as before the Act 1 Will. 4, c. 40, s. 2, constituted him a trustee: Powell v. Merritt, 1 Sm. & Gif. 381; Cradock v. Owen, 2 ib. 241.

(f) That is, if made by the quasi tenant in tail in possession. "If made by tenant in tail in remainder, it must be with the concurrence of the owner of the previous estate in possession (*Slade v. (g) 6 T. R. 293.

(h) 1 Sch. & Lef. 294.

(i) 1 Ball & Bea. 77. The editors of previous editions substituted for Dillon v. Dillon a reference to the case of Hopkins v. Ramage (Batty, 365), and added: "The decision of Lord Manners in Dillon v. Dillon, 1 Ba. & Be. 77, does not touch the question, for the quasi tenant in tail died without issue, and therefore, at her death, there was nothing for the will to operate upon, and the learned Judge expressly rested his decision on this fact. In Hopkins v. Ramage, the circumstances were precisely similar, but the opinion of the Court was expressed in general terms."

not so devised, bequeathed, or disposed of, would devolve upon the heir at law, or customary heir of him, or, if he became entitled by descent, of his ancestor, or upon his executor or administrator.'

CHAPTER IV.

"The terms of this enactment evidently restrict it to cases in which property, in the absence of disposition, would devolve to the general real or personal representatives of the testator, as distinguished from the case now under consideration, in which the devolution would be to the heir special."

Leases for lives with a covenant for perpetual renewal are not uncommonly met with in Ireland (k).

Renewable leases for lives.

VII.—Incorporeal Hereditaments.—Existing rights of this nature, so far as they are alienable, can apparently be the subject of a devise. Thus a rentcharge, a seignory (l), or an advowson (m), or right of common in gross, can clearly be devised (n). Of course a right which is inseparable from a tenement (such as an easement or right of common for cattle levant and couchant) cannot be disposed of by will except with the tenement (o), or (in the case of an easement) by being devised to the owner of the servient tenement so as to be extinguished (p).

Devise of existing rights.

It seems equally clear that a rentcharge, easement, profit à prendre or similar right, which can be created by grant, can be created by devise de novo (q).

Creation de novo.

A way of necessity may be impliedly created by a devise of land (r), and the doctrine as to the creation of implied easements by the contemporaneous grant of adjoining pieces of land applies to devises (s).

Implication.

VIII.—Choses in Action.—Legal choses in action, such as debts, may be disposed of by will (t), and if they are given specifically, it is the duty of the executors to get them in and hand them over to the legatee (u). The Wills Act does not enable the legatee to sue for them in his own name (v).

Government securities.

Money in the public funds, bonds of foreign governments, and other so-called government securities, are not choses in action in the strict sense, because no action lies to enforce them, but there is no doubt that they are personal property (w), and can therefore be disposed of by will.

Life insurance.

A person who effects a policy of insurance on his own life can primâ facie dispose of it by his will (x). Whether a specific bequest of a policy confers such a "derivative title" as to enable the legatee to sue for the policy moneys in his own name under the Policies of Assurance Act, 1867, does not seem to have been decided.

Non-bequeathable policy.

A person effecting an insurance on his own life may by the terms of the contract restrict his right to dispose of the policy by will (y), or may debar himself altogether from the right of testamentary disposition (z).

Friendly society.

By the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, which repealed and re-enacted the provisions of some earlier acts, a member of a friendly society may in certain cases, by writing under his hand, nominate a person to receive any moneys (not exceeding 100*l.*) payable by the society on the death of the member, and may in like manner revoke or vary any such nomination; it cannot be revoked by will, and if a nomination is in force at the death of the member, the money forms no part of his estate (a).

Torts.

As regards rights of action for tort, the general rule of the common law is that "actio personalis moritur cum personâ." In a few cases at common law, and in several cases by statute, the personal representatives of a deceased person can sue for injuries to his property, and, under Lord Campbell's Act, for a personal injury causing his death. In the latter case the damages recovered do not form part of the deceased's estate (b).

Equitable choses in action.

In certain cases an equitable chose in action may be disposed of by will. Thus where a conveyance has been executed under circumstances which would give the grantor a right in equity to have it set aside, such a right is clearly devisable (c).

CHAPTER IV.

Locality of

The question whether a gift of "property" or "estate" in a particular place includes choses in action is often a difficult one. A gift of property in a particular district or country (whether in England or abroad) passes money arising from real estate situate there (d), and debts owing by persons resident there (e), and apparently stocks and shares which are only transferable there. In the case of shares which can be transferred either in England or in a foreign country on production of the share certificate, it seems that their locality is governed by the certificate: if it is in England at the time of the testator's death, the shares will be considered as situate in England (f).

How far a gift of "property" in a house, box, cabinet, &c., is effectual to pass choses in action, has been discussed in several cases. In Re Prater (g), a testator bequeathed "my property at R.'s bank"; at the time of his will and of his death he had at R.'s bank in Paris a cash balance and certificates of shares in French companies which apparently entitled any person holding them to the ownership of the shares: it was held that the cash balance and the shares passed by the bequest.

house, &c.

This question is also discussed in the chapter on Legacies, with reference to bequests of personal property in a particular place.

Where a person contracts to purchase land, this is an interest which he can devise by will (h).

In the case of a person entering into such a contract and dying before 1878, his heir or devisee was entitled to the benefit of it; in other words, was entitled to consider the contract as having converted the personal estate, quoad the purchase money, into real estate, although from subsequent events, arising out of the situation of the deceased purchaser's estate, the contract should, as against the vendor, have been rescinded (i). But as regards the estates of persons dying after December 31, 1877, the Real Estate Charges Act, 1877, enacts that where a testator or intestate dies entitled to land of whatever tenure, which is at his death charged by way of lien for unpaid purchase-money, the devisee or legatee or heir shall not be entitled to have the money discharged out of any other estate of the testator or intestate, unless, in the case of a testator, a contrary intention appears from the will, (j). In such a case, therefore, all that the devisee or heir is entitled to is the land charged with the purchase-money (k).

But even under the old law, if from a defect of title or any other cause the contract was not obligatory on the purchaser at his death, his heir or devisee was never entitled to say he would take the estate with its defects, or have the purchase-money laid out in the purchase of another. Thus in Broome v. Monck (l), which was a case of defective title, Lord Eldon observed that the cases establish, that whatever is the state of liability of the party himself at his death, must be the state of liability to be considered upon questions between those representing him after his death (m); and if at his death he could not be compelled to take, clearly the heir could not say to the executor, "I will have the estate and shall pay you for it" (n).

Contract for sale of land.

The converse case of a testator entering into a contract for the sale of land devised by his will, often gives rise to the question whether the contract operates as a revocation of the devise. This question is discussed in Chapter XXII.

Right of residence or occupation.

IX.—Miscellaneous Rights and Interests.—A testator may give to A. the right of residing in or occupying a particular house or other property rent free, in terms which shew that the right is personal to A. and cannot be assigned by him to another (o). A.

(j) See Puxley v. Puxley, 1 N. R. 509 (before the Act), where the testator had contracted to purchase an estate, and taken a transfer of a mortgage on it; by his will he directed the purchase to be completed, and devised the estate to A.: it was held that A. was not entitled to the interest on the mortgage before the completion of the purchase.

objection, there can be no conversion: Re Thomas, Thomas v. Howell, 34 Ch. D. 166.

is, however, a tenant for life within the meaning of the Settled Land Acts (p), and his powers under the act cannot be restricted by any clause of forfeiture (q).

The cases in which a devise of the use and occupation of land gives the devisee an estate are considered elsewhere (r).

A testator may give a person the right of purchasing property forming part of the testator's estate, either at a price named by the testator, or at a price to be fixed by the executors, or by valuation or otherwise (s). If the price is to be fixed by the executors, they are bound to fix a reasonable price (t), but the Court will not interfere if they act in good faith (u). If any terms are imposed by the testator as to time, &c., they must be strictly complied with, otherwise the right will be lost (v); but if the offer is to be made by the executors, time is reckoned from the date when a complete offer is made (w).

It is not clear to what extent the ordinary law of vendor and purchaser applies to a purchase under an option. It seems that the person exercising the option is not necessarily entitled to an abstract of title, and even if he is, the terms of the will may be such that failure on the part of the executors to deliver an abstract will not absolve him from complying with the requirements of the will as to time (x). On the other hand, it has been decided that, in the absence of a direction to the contrary, he is entitled to have the property free from incumbrances (y).

Rights conferred by option.

An option of purchase given by will to A. B. is prima facie personal to him, and does not pass to his executors on his death (z), but the will may be so expressed as to confer a transmissible interest (a). It seems clear that if an option of purchase is not personal to the donee, its exercise must be confined to the period allowed by the Rule against Perpetuities (b).

CHAPTER IV.

Compulsory purchase.

If a testator gives an option of purchase at a fixed price, and after his death the property is sold at a higher price under the compulsory powers of the Land Clauses Act, the donee of the option is entitled to the difference (c). A similar rule applies if the sale is by order of the Court (d).

Right of selection.

A gift to A. of such part of a certain property as shall be selected by him is valid (e). The right is a personal one, and therefore it would seem that if A. survives the testator and dies before selecting, the right is gone (f). But this would probably not be so where the part to be selected is indefinite and unrestricted, for then the gift is equivalent to a gift of the whole property (g).

Executory and contingent interests.

An executory or contingent interest in real or personal estate is disposable by will, if the nature of the contingency on which it is dependent be such that the interest does not cease with the life of the testator ; in other words, if it be descendible or transmissible. This doctrine, in regard to real estate, was recognised in Goodtitle v. Wood (h), and was finally established in Roe d. Perry v. Jones (i) by the Court of K. B. ; Lord Kenyon, C. J., drawing a distinction between such an interest and a mere possibility, like that which an heir has from his ancestor. Buller, J., observed, that if it was such an interest as was descendible, it was also devisable, as they must both be governed by the same principle. The converse of this proposition is equally true, namely, that an interest which is not transmissible cannot be devised (j). A contingent interest in personal property can be bequeathed by will if it is transmissible (k). As regards wills made since the year 1837, the statute of 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 3, has expressly provided that the testamentary power conferred by it "shall extend to all contingent, executory, or other future interests in any real or personal estate, whether the testator may or may not be ascertained as the person or one of the persons in whom the same respectively may have become vested."

Rights of action (m) and entry (n) were not, under the old law, devisable, but the Wills Act has expressly extended the testamentary power to "all rights of entry for conditions broken and other rights of entry," so that a possibility of reverter is now devisable (o). And as to rights of action, the question cannot recur since the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 36, abolishing real actions.

CHAPTER IV.

As to rights of action and entry.

Possibility of reverter.

Possession without title confers a devisable interest, which may be defended and recovered by the devisee against all but the true owner (q).

Possession de facto.

When a testator appoints a solicitor to be executor or trustee of his will, he sometimes empowers him to charge for services rendered by him in performing the duties of his office. Whether the right to make such charges is confined strictly to professional services or extends to other matters, depends on the language of the will (r).

Profit costs.

The right to charge profit costs is in the nature of a legacy (s), and the solicitor forfeits it by attesting the will (t).

In some cases (apart from the doctrine of powers) property passes under the will of a testator, although it never belonged to him. Thus where a gift of real or personal property by will to a child of the testator is preserved from lapse by sect. 33 of the Wills Act, and the child has left a will containing a sufficient residuary gift, the property bequeathed or devised to the child by the father's will passes under the residuary gift in the child's will (u). A similar result follows when personal property is expressly given by will to A., and in the event of his predeceasing the testator, then to his executors as part of his personal estate, and A. predeceases the testator, leaving a will containing a sufficient residuary bequest (v).

CHAPTER IV.

It is hardly necessary to say that personal property limited by settlement merely to the executors or administrators of the settlor may be disposed of by his will, since he himself takes absolutely under such a limitation (w).

So if land is limited, by virtue of a shifting clause, to A., and before it takes effect A. dies intestate, leaving B. his heir, and B. dies, having made a will containing a general devise of real estate, and then the shifting clause takes effect, the land passes by the devise (x).

Real estate.

X.—Operative Words of Testamentary Disposition.—The appropriate word for disposing of land and other real estate is “devise,” but of course any word indicating that intention, such as “bequeath,” although more properly applicable to personalty, is sufficient (y). A difficulty as to the intention in such cases arises where the gift is referential. Thus in Jackson v. Hosie (z), a testator made various specific dispositions of real and personal property, and went on to direct that as to the residue of the property “not hereinbefore specifically bequeathed,” it should be divided rateably among certain persons in proportion to “the bequests hereinbefore specifically given” to them: it was held that these words included devisees of real estate, although the testator had in other parts of his will used the word “devise” in disposing of his real estate. But an appointment of a person as “my residuary legatee” will only give him the testator’s personal estate, unless an intention to dispose of the realty is apparent (a). An appointment of a person as “executor of all my property,” or the like, may operate to pass land to him, either beneficially or as trustee (b).

“I make
A. B. my

An appointment or acknowledgment of a person as the testator’s heir may operate as a general devise of his real estate (c).

(b) See Doe v. Haslewood, 6 Ad. & E. 167, and other cases cited in Chap. XXVII.

(c) In Spark v. Purnell (Hob. 75), a testator devised part of his lands to Anthony, and part to William, and willed that if either should die, one of them should be the other’s heir. The Court said: “If by my will I appoint that J. S., shall be heir of my land, he shall have it in fee; for such estate as the ancestor hath such he is to inherit. And, therefore, the said word (heir) in the latter clause, between William and Anthony, shall give him an estate for life to the survivor, because the brother to whom he is made heir, had but an estate for term of life before.” See Tilly v. Collyer, Taylor v. Webb, and other cases cited post, Chaps. XIV. and XIX.

The appropriate word for disposing of personal property, including leaseholds, is "bequeath," but the word "devise" was formerly used as an operative word for bequeathing personalty (d), and of course may at the present time be so used, if the intention is clear (e).

CHAPTER IV.
Personalty.

It is clear that if a testator appoints a person to be his residuary legatee, that will give him all the testator's residuary personal estate. The contest in such cases generally is, whether the words are sufficient, with the aid of the context, to pass the real estate (f).

Disability of corporations
by devise.

I.—Corporations.—The history of the law is thus stated by Mr. Jarman (a) : “ The statute of 34 Hen. 8, c. 5, expressly excepted out of its enabling clause devises to bodies politic and corporate ; and, accordingly, it was held, that a devise to a corporation, whether aggregate or sole, either for its own benefit or as trustee, was void ; and the lands so devised descended to the heir, either beneficially or charged with the trust, as the case might be (b). The recent statute contains no such prohibition, the legislature having contented itself with regulating and defining the powers and capacities of testators, without in any manner interfering with, or attempting to define, the capacities of persons to take under testamentary dispositions, which it has left to be ascertained and determined by the application of the general principles of law. If, therefore, the disability of corporations to acquire real estate by devise had been created by the statute of Henry, the recent Act of 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26 would, by repealing that statute without reviving the prohibition, have had the effect of giving validity to such devises ; but this is not the case. The disability of corporations to hold real property was created by various antecedent statutes (c), which appear to have been founded on the principle that, by allowing lands to become vested in objects endowed with perpetuity of duration, the lords were deprived of escheats and other feudal profits. Hence, the necessity of obtaining the King's licence, he being the ultimate lord of every fee in the kingdom; but this licence only remitted his own rights, and did not prevent the right of forfeiture accruing to intermediate lords. Doubts having arisen, however, at the Revolution how far such licence was valid (d), as being an exercise of the dispensing power formerly claimed by the Crown (but which, it is pretty evident, it was not, but merely a waiver of its own right of forfeiture (e)), the statute 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 37, was passed, which provides that the Crown for the future, at its own discretion, may grant licences to alien or take in mortmain, of whomsoever the tenements shall be holden. At this day, therefore, the licence from the Crown protects against forfeiture to any intermediate lord."

Acts.

(a) First edition, p. 57. By “ the recent statute ” Mr. Jarman of course means the Wills Act, 1837.

The language of the old statutes is extremely vague, but their intention obviously was not only to prevent tenants in fee simple from aliening their land in mortmain to the injury of their superior lords, but also to prevent land from being "amortised" to the injury of the community. Consequently, when the practice grew up of granting licences to avoid forfeiture under the acts, it was considered necessary in every case to have the licence of the lord of the fee and other superior lords to enable the tenant to alien, and also the licence of the Crown to enable the corporation to hold; for, as Coke says, "Corporations have capacitie to take but not to retaine, unless they have a sufficient licence in that behalfe (f)."

After the Act 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 37 (see above), it became the practice in granting a licence in mortmain for the Crown to authorise the corporation to acquire and hold lands, and also to authorise all persons to convey lands to the corporation (g). In more modern times, however, it seems to have been considered that a licence to a corporation to acquire and hold lands in mortmain, implied a licence to other persons to convey them to the corporation, and the express licence to do so fell into disuse (h). person, not having a licence to alien in mortmain, can alien to a corporation having only a licence for themselves to hold in mortmain (without the clause enabling all persons to alien to them), so as to prevent the entry of the immediate lord or of the Crown for the escheat, seems never to have been settled, and perhaps is more curious than practically important (hh)."

The Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, which passed into law on August 13, 1888, repeals (sec. 13) the old statutes relating to gifts in mortmain, but the operation of this repeal is not retrospective, so that the law with regard to testamentary gifts coming under these categories, made by testators who died prior to the passing of the act, are still regulated by the former law. Sect. 1 of this act enacts that, "(1) Land shall not be assured to or for the benefit of, or acquired by or on behalf of any corporation in mortmain, otherwise than under the authority of a licence from Her Majesty the Queen, or of a statute for the time being in force, and, if any land is so assured otherwise than as aforesaid, the land shall be forfeited to Her Majesty from the date of the assurance, and Her Majesty may enter on and hold the land accordingly." Subsect. 2 of the same section provides that where the land is held of one or more mesne lords under Her Majesty, each mesne lord is to have the right of entering on and holding the land within a certain time, but the right of each superior lord is only to be exercised if the inferior lord fails to exercise his right of entry within the proper time. Sect. 2 enacts that, "It shall be lawful for Her Majesty the Queen, if and when and in such form as she thinks fit, to grant to any person or corporation a licence to assure in mortmain land in perpetuity or otherwise, and to grant to any corporation a licence to acquire land in mortmain, and to hold the land in perpetuity or otherwise (i)."

In this act, unless the context otherwise requires, "assurance" includes a gift, devise, bequest, or other assurance by will, and "assure" and "assuror" have corresponding meanings; and "land" includes tenements and hereditaments corporeal and incorporeal of whatever tenure and any estate or interest in land (j).

The act also provides (sect. 12) that "Nothing in this act shall affect the operation or validity of any charter, licence, or

(i) This section is a partial re-enactment of s. 1 of stat. 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 37, but it omits the important words "of whomsoever the same shall be holden," and fails to re-enact s. 2 of the same statute, protecting from forfeiture lands aliened in pursuance of a licence so granted.

customs in force at the passing of this act enabling land to be assured or held in mortmain"; and further (sect. 13) that the repeal of previous enactments shall not affect "(a) any enactment not hereby repealed referring to any enactment hereby repealed, except that in lieu of that reference the unrepealed enactment shall be construed as if it referred to the corresponding provisions of this act; or, (b) the past operation of any enactment hereby repealed, or any instrument or thing executed, done, or suffered before the passing of this act; or, (c) any right, obligation, or liability acquired, accrued, or incurred under any enactment hereby repealed; or (d) any action, proceeding, or thing pending or uncompleted at the time of the passing of this act."

This act was obviously intended to consolidate and re-enact the former statutes relating to mortmain and charitable uses (k). But, unfortunately, the draftsman appears to have been imperfectly acquainted with the difficulties which had arisen under the old Mortmain Acts, for the wording of the new act seems to revive, instead of setting at rest, the question whether a general licence to a corporation to acquire and hold lands is sufficient to authorise a tenant in fee simple to alien his land to the corporation without a licence for that purpose. However, it seems incredible that any court should hold that such a licence is necessary, and it is submitted that there is nothing which prevents a corporation empowered to acquire and hold lands in mortmain from taking by devise in the ordinary way.

Where, before the Wills Act, real estate was devised upon trust to a corporation not empowered to take lands by devise, although the devise was, of course, void at law, under the statute of Henry, yet the estate descended to the heir charged with the trust (supposing that it was not illegal under the statute 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, as being in favour of charity), in the same manner as where a devise to a trustee fails by the death of the devisee in trust in the testator's lifetime (l). And since the Wills Act, the trust would equally be upheld; the only difference being that the corporation trustee is now capable (except in cases within the Mortmain Act of 1736 or 1888) of taking by devise, though not, without licence, of holding.

Devises to corporations in trust.

It was held in Flood's Case (m) that a devise to a corporation

CHAPTER V. to charitable uses, although ineffectual to pass the legal estate by reason of the statute 34 Hen. 8, was good in equity under the statute 43 Eliz. c. 4. By the Act 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, as it is hardly necessary to point out, such devises were rendered wholly void, except in the case of corporations having a licence to acquire lands by devise (n). Whether devises to unlicensed charitable corporations are now valid under the Mortmain, &c., Act, 1891, is discussed in another place (o).

favour of
porations, &c.

It should be observed, however, that devises to some corporations are authorised by act of parliament. For instance, the statute 43 Geo. 3, c. 107, enables persons to devise lands to the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty; and the statute 43 Geo. 3, c. 108, authorises, under certain limitations, the devise to any persons or bodies politic or corporate, of land (not exceeding five acres), for the erection, repair, purchase, or providing of churches or chapels, where the liturgy of the United Church of England and Ireland shall be used, or of the mansion-house for the residence of the minister, or of any out-buildings, offices, churchyard, or glebe, for the same respectively. And similar enactments have been made in favour of many other charity corporations (p). And although generally devises for charitable uses are forbidden by the Act of 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, yet the 4th section of that statute, which excepts out of its operation gifts to the two English Universities, and the Colleges of Eton, Winchester, and Westminster, leaves devises to those corporations to be dealt with by the general law as settled by the Wills Act.

It may be added that sect. 7 of the Act of 1888, which repeals and re-enacts the Act of 9 Geo. 2, extends the exemption to gifts to the Universities of London and Durham, and the Victoria University, and the various colleges of the universities above mentioned (q).

The 6th section also excepts from the operation of Parts I. and II. of the act, under certain conditions, testamentary gifts for public parks, elementary schools, and public museums. There are numerous other acts which contain similar exemptions (r).

(o) Chap. IX.

(p) See Church Building Act, 9 Geo. 4, c. 42, and other statutes stated, post, Chap. X., and in Shelford on Charitable Uses. These exemptions are continued by s. 8 of the Act of 1888, (q) The Universities are apparently excepted from Part I. of the Act only to the extent provided by their special Acts, see Tudor on Charities, &c., 427.

(r) Such as the Technical and Industrial Institutions Act, 1892, the Education Act, 1902, &c. See as to County Councils and other local authorities, the Mortmain, &c. Act, 1892.

It will of course be remembered that a power to hold land does not of itself empower a corporation to acquire land for charitable purposes. The two questions are quite distinct (s).

CHAPTER V.

The Companies (Consolidation) Act 1908, which repeals, and in effect re-enacts, the provisions of the Companies Act, 1862, enacts (sect. 16) that every company incorporated in accordance with the provisions of the act shall have power to hold lands; and (sect. 19) that a company formed for the purpose of promoting art, science, religion, charity, or any other like object, not involving the acquisition of gain by the company or by its individual members shall not, without the licence of the Board of Trade, hold more than two acres of land; but the Board of Trade may by licence empower any such company to hold lands in such quantity, and subject to such conditions, as they think fit. The use in these sections of the word "hold," without any word giving a power to acquire land, suggests a doubt whether a devise of land to a trading company by a testator not licensed to alien lands in mortmain would be valid, even if the company would have had power to purchase the land for the purpose of its business. But to hold such a devise void would be taking a highly technical view of the act, for it is admitted that a company formed under the act can purchase land, and that being so there is no reason why it should not be able to take by devise.

Act, 1862.

Questions on gifts by will to corporations sole do not often arise. They seem to labour under the same general incapacity to hold land without a licence in mortmain as corporations aggregate (t). It seems that since the passing of the Mortmain, &c., Act, 1891, land can be validly devised to a corporation sole (such as a rector or vicar) upon charitable trusts, but it must be sold in accordance with the act (u).

sole.

A registered trade union, although not a corporation, is "a legal entity," and may be sued in its registered name (v). But a devise of land to such a society is invalid (w).

Quasicorporations.

A gift by will to a voluntary society or association of persons, such as a club, for their own benefit, is clearly good. But if it is

Law before
tion Act, 1870.

II.—Aliens.—The incapacity of alienage has been removed, as we have already seen, by the Naturalization Act, 1870 (y). But the act not being retrospective, and giving no protection to rights acquired by an alien before it was passed (z), it is still necessary to consider the old law. Alienage could not, strictly speaking, be ranked among the incapacities to take real estate by devise, as the property remained in the alien till office found, when it devolved to the Crown (a). On this principle, where lands were devised to an alien and another concurrently as joint tenants, the entirety did not vest in the latter (as would have been the effect if the devise to the alien had been absolutely void), but in both jointly; and if the Crown did not during the joint lives seize the alien's undivided moiety (as it might do after office found (b)), then, on the decease of the alien, leaving his co-devisee surviving, such moiety devolved to the latter by virtue of the jus accrescendi, which is incidental to every joint tenancy, subject, of course, to the Crown's right of seizure, after office; which would, by relation, have overreached the title of the surviving joint tenant to the alien's moiety (c). If, however, the alien survived his co-devisee, he did not, in the opinion of some persons, thereby become entitled to the entirety, he being disabled from acquiring a title by operation of law, even for the benefit of the Crown, on the principle that the law, by its own act, never gave an estate to one whom it did not permit to retain it (d); but though the principle is unquestionable, perhaps this application of it may be fairly excepted to, as the survivor seems to have been in by the original gift.

but by its prerogative on grounds of public policy (g), a title which extended, à fortiori, to the trust of chattel interests in land (h), except such as an alien might himself hold (i). But the proceeds of real estate, which was impressed with a trust for conversion, could be given to an alien, and the Crown had no claim, this not being a trust conferring on the alien an interest in land, but merely a right to have the land converted into money; and the policy of the law in regard to mortmain (which had been much pressed in argument as analogous in principle) depending upon considerations entirely different (j).

The disabilities of alienage might be removed partially by a grant of letters of denization from the Crown, or wholly by an act of parliament investing the alien with the rights and privileges of a British subject. Such acts, in favour of the particular individual, were superseded by the Act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66 (now repealed), which (sect. 6) empowered the Secretary of State to grant certificates of naturalisation, having the same effect as the ordinary

tion and

In Co. Litt. 191a, n. vi. 11, Mr. Butler suggests that a better ground in favour of the claim of the crown might, perhaps, have been found, by resorting to its acknowledged prerogative of being entitled to the bona vacantia, or every species of property of which no owner is discoverable: but the suggestion was never acted upon. As to Lord Loughborough's often-cited dictum, that "the crown comes under no head of equity," Walker v. Denne, 2 Ves. jun. 179, see per Romilly, M. R., in Barrow v. Wadkin. The dictum appears to be warranted when used with reference to a trust for conversion in a case where there is a total failure of the objects of the trust. Thus, in Walker v. Denne, the crown was held not entitled to enforce against the next of kin a trust for laying out money in land where there was a total failure of cestuis que trust, and the only result would be to enable the crown to claim by escheat: and in Taylor v. Haygarth, 14 Sim. 8, where real and personal estate was devised to trustees on trust for sale, and the surplus proceeds were left undisposed of, and all legacies and annuities had been satisfied out of the personalty, Sir L. Shadwell, V.-C., held, on a failure of heirs and next of kin, that the trustee was entitled for his own benefit, and that the crown was not entitled to a decree for sale merely that it might take the produce as bona vacantia. But it does not follow "because the crown could not enforce the execution of a trust to sell in favour of a non-existing person, that therefore the crown could have no benefit of a trust for an existing person, the beneficial interest in which had through that person become vested in the crown;" per M. R., 24 Beav. 17. In Henchman v. Att.-Gen., 3 My. & K. 485, the claim of the crown to a sum of money provided by the will to be paid by the devisee of lands to a charity, and assumed to be an exception from the devise (see post, Chap. XIII.), was negatived, and the money held to sink for the benefit of the devisee. The difference between this case and that of the alien, is that in the latter there is a person who can take though he cannot hold; in the former the object cannot take.

acts of naturalisation; and enacted (sect. 5) that every alien friend might, by grant, lease, assignment, bequest, representation, or otherwise, take and hold any lands or tenements for the purpose of residence, occupation, or trade, for any term not exceeding twenty-one years, as if he were a natural-born subject.

An act of naturalisation was always so framed as not to render valid antecedent conveyances by the alien, the terms of the enactment being, that he shall be and is henceforth naturalised, &c. (k); and the Act 7 & 8 Vict. is in equivalent terms. But letters of denization expressly authorise the denizen to hold lands theretofore granted (l), and he may even hold such as devolve to him by act of law, except, of course, that formerly he could not claim by descent from or through his father, if an alien (m).

Foreigners.

As regards disabilities imposed on aliens by the laws of their own countries, the general rule seems to be that the English courts disregard all personal disabilities and disqualifications unknown to English law (n).

Gifts to
witnesses.

III.—Gifts to Attesting Witnesses.—Under the Statute of Frauds, a devise of land was required to be attested by “credible” witnesses, a character which persons having a beneficial interest under the will were held not to sustain, and accordingly, a will of freehold estate attested by such persons was invalid; and that, too, not only as to the part which created the interest of the attesting witness, but in regard to the whole (o).

Stat. 25 Geo.

It was soon found that the holding a will of freeholds to be invalid on account of the existence of an interest, however remote or minute, in any one of the attesting witnesses, was productive of much inconvenience; and it being apparent that to render the witness competent, by depriving him of the benefit which affected his disinterestedness, was far better than to sacrifice the entire will, the statute 25 Geo. 2, c. 6 (p), was passed, which, after reciting the 29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 5, provided, that beneficial devises, legacies, &c., to attesting witnesses, other than and except charges on lands, &c., for payment of debts, should, so far only as concerned such attesting witnesses, or any person claiming under

By the Wills Act the legislature has adopted the principle, and extended the operation, of the enactments in the statute 25 Geo. 2, c. 6, which it repeals, except as to the colonies in America. Stat. 1 Vict. c. 26.

Sect. 14 provides that if any person, who shall attest the execution of a will, shall at the time of the execution thereof, or at any time afterwards, be incompetent to be admitted a witness to prove the execution thereof, such will shall not on that account be invalid. Will not to be void on account of incompetency of attesting witnesses.

Sect. 15 provides that if any person shall attest the execution of any will to whom, or to whose wife or husband, any beneficial devise, legacy, estate, interest, gift or appointment, of or affecting any real or personal estate (other than and except charges and directions for the payment of any debt or debts), shall be thereby given or made, such devise, legacy, estate, interest, gift, or appointment, shall, so far only as concerns such person attesting the execution of such will, or the wife or husband of such person, or any person claiming under such person, or wife or husband, be utterly null and void ; and such person so attesting shall be admitted as a witness to prove the execution of such will, or to prove the validity or invalidity thereof, notwithstanding such devise, legacy, estate, interest, gift, or appointment, mentioned in such will. Gift to an attesting witness or wife or husband of witness to be void.

Sect. 16 provides that in case by any will any real or personal estate shall be charged with any debt or debts, and any creditor, or the wife or husband of any creditor, whose debt is so charged, shall attest the execution of such will, such creditor, notwithstanding such charge, shall be admitted a witness to prove the execution of such will, or to prove the validity or invalidity thereof. Creditor attesting to be admitted a witness.

Sect. 17 provides that no person shall, on account of his being an executor of a will, be incompetent to be admitted a witness to prove the execution of such will, or a witness to prove the validity or invalidity thereof. Executor to be admitted a witness.

These enactments preclude, as to wills coming within their provisions, all questions arising under the old law as to the effect of a gift to the husband or wife of an attesting witness, and they extend the disqualification of the witness to take beneficially to wills of every description; the act having, by assimilating the execution of wills of real and personal estate, destroyed all ground for distinguishing between them in regard to this point.

Upon the construction of the 15th section, it has been decided that a legatee under a will does not lose his legacy by attesting a codicil which confirms the will (r): and further, that a residuary legatee by so doing, does not lose his share of the residue, although the codicil in fact increases that share by revoking some particular legacies (s). Each witness attests only the instrument to which he puts his name. Consequently, if a will consists of separate sheets of paper, executed by the testator on the same day, but separately attested, a legatee under one of them does not forfeit his legacy by reason of his having attested one or more of the other sheets (t). Again, where a will attested by a legatee is re-published by a codicil attested by other witnesses, the gift to the legatee is made good (u). And this benefit is not lost to the legatee by his subsequent attestation of a second codicil (v). But where by will a legacy was bequeathed in a contingency which failed, and by a codicil attested by the legatee, the legacy was made absolute, the legatee was held disqualified to take the absolute legacy (w). And, following the rule regarding wills of real estate under the pre-existing law, a witness is held to be disqualified to take as legatee although he is a supernumerary (x). But evidence is admissible to shew under what circumstances the supernumerary signed, and if it appears that he did not sign as a witness (e.g., if he did not sign at the request of the testator, or contemporaneously with the attesting witnesses) he will not lose his legacy (y). According to numerous cases, the rule is, that if a will contains the names of three or more persons who appear to be attesting witnesses, some of them being legatees, all the names must be included in the probate, in order that the question whether the legatees did or did not sign as witnesses may be decided in a court of equity (z).

But in In bonis Sharman (a), where the general rule was recognised, the question had to be decided by the Court of Probate, because on it depended the further question to whom the grant was to go. Lord Penzance held on the evidence that the residuary legatee did not sign as an attesting witness, and directed her name to be omitted from the grant. This decision appears to be generally regarded as laying down the rule that it is the function of the Court of Probate to decide the question in all cases, (b) and that if the name of a person is included in the probate as an attesting witness, that is conclusive on the Court of Construction (c). But the rule laid down by the earlier cases is, it is submitted, more in accordance with principle.

It has been held that a person who attests the attestation of a marksman is himself an attesting witness to the will, and a legacy to him consequently fails (d).

It has further been held, upon the construction of this section, that where there is a testamentary gift for life, which fails by reason of the attestation of the will by the donee, or by his or her wife or husband, with remainder to the children of the donee, and in default of children then over, the remainder to the children, if in existence at the testator's death, will not be defeated, but will be accelerated and become an immediate interest (e); but that, if there is then no child of the donee for life, the ultimate gift upon the determination of the life interest cannot be accelerated, but during the life of the donee, and until birth of issue, the income of real estate will belong to the testator's heir-at-law (f). In the case of personalty the interim income would, on the same principle, go to the testator's next of kin (g).

Acceleration of remainders where life interest is given to attesting witness.

The gift which fails by the operation of the section is not struck out of the will for all purposes; consequently if there is a gift to "A. or her children," and A.'s husband attests the will, the failure of the gift to A. does not make the substitutionary gift to her children take effect (g).

Where attesting witness is trustee.

sect. 15 of the Wills Act, if an attesting witness, who, at the time of the attesting act, takes no benefit under the will, subsequently marries the devisee or legatee (h).

A direction by will that a solicitor executor or trustee may make professional charges, creates a benefit under the will within the meaning of this section; and consequently if the solicitor attests the will, he is precluded from claiming the right to make the charges (i).

A gift to an attesting witness as trustee is not invalidated by sect. 15 (j).

In Re Fleetwood (k), Hall, V.C., held that where a gift is made by will to a trustee upon a parol trust, a person who attests the will cannot take any benefit under the trust, but the point was not argued, and the decision has not been followed in Ireland (l).

In allowing an attesting witness to be appointed executor, whether he be or be not in terms made an executor in trust, regard is evidently had to the statute of 1 Will. 4, c. 40, which precludes executors from claiming, by virtue of their office, the beneficial interest in the undisposed-of personal estate of their testator, to which, by the pre-existing law, an executor was entitled, where the will did not afford any presumption of a contrary intention, a point which was often difficult of solution.

IV.—Devise to Testator's Heir.—Another disability to take by devise formerly arose out of the doctrine, that where a title by descent and a title by devise concurred in the same individual, the former predominated, and the heir was in by descent and not by purchase. If however the quality of the estate which the heir took by the devise differed from that which would have descended upon him, he acquired the property as devisee (m).

And as to the devise of a contingent remainder to the

Whether the doctrine in question extended to testamentary appointments was a point of some nicety, and occasioned much discussion (n), into which, however, it is not now proposed to enter, as questions of this nature cannot arise under any will, future or recent; the statute of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106, s. 3, having provided that, when any land shall have been devised by any testator who shall die after December 31, 1832, to the heir, or to the person who shall be the heir of such testator, such heir shall be considered to have acquired the land as a devisee, and not by descent (o).

Stat. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106, s. 3, making a heir-devisee a purchaser.

It has been decided that the word "heir" includes "heirs," and that the section operates to alter the quality of the estate taken by the heir, so that if a testator leaves co-heiresses, they take as joint tenants under a devise to them, and not as coparceners (p).

V.—Illegitimate Children.—A bastard in esse, whether born or unborn, is competent to be a devisee or legatee of real or personal estate; and the only question that now admits of discussion, in regard to gifts to such persons, is, whether they are sufficiently designated as the objects of them (q); and this depends on rules of construction of great practical importance in the preparation of wills, and which will hereafter receive examination. Whether a gift can be made to bastards not procreated, is a vexata quæstio, which will be fully considered in a later part of this work (r).

Devises and bequests to bastards.

VI.—Infants, Females covert, Lunatics, &c.—Infants (including infants en ventre sa mère (s)) and insane persons are not incapacitated from taking by devise or bequest, though they cannot manifest their acceptance; for acceptance will be presumed unless it would work injury to the devisee or legatee. But they cannot give effectual releases, or exercise a right of election (see Chapter XVI), and according to Mr. Roper (t), where a legacy is given to an infant, the executor cannot pay it to the infant or to any one on his behalf.

CHAPTER V.

This is clearly so where the infant's father is living (u). In order to relieve executors from responsibility in the case of legacies bequeathed to infants, the Legacy Duty Act, 1796, s. 32 (v), provided that where a legacy could not be paid by reason of the infancy of the legatee, the executor might pay the money into Court. In the opinion of several eminent text writers (w) (and, it is believed, of the profession at large), payment into Court under this Act was the only way in which an executor could discharge himself from responsibility. However, in the Irish case of M'Creight v. M'Creight (x), Brady, L.C., decided, though with some hesitation, that having regard to the terms of the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 24, a testamentary guardian can give a valid receipt for a legacy bequeathed to his ward. In Re Cresswell (y), where a legacy had been paid into Court under the Legacy Duty Act, Fry, J., refused to order it to be paid out to the testamentary guardian of the infant, on the ground that he was not "the person entitled thereto" within the meaning of the Act, but the learned judge disclaimed any intention of throwing doubts on the correctness of the decision in M'Creight v. M'Creight.

A testator may, of course, expressly authorise payment of a legacy to an infant (z), or to a parent, guardian, or other person on his behalf, and the legacy may properly be paid accordingly.

Married women.

Property devised or bequeathed to a married woman, unless given to her separate use, was formerly subject to her husband's rights in respect of it. Accordingly if a legacy was given to a married woman, without more, the money could not be paid to her (a), for nothing but an actual payment to the husband, or a release by him, would be a discharge as against the wife surviving (b). But the executors might, in a proper case, decline to pay the legacy to the husband except upon the terms of his making a proper settlement on his wife (c).

It may be mentioned that even at common law, although a man could not convey land to his wife during the coverture, he could devise it to her by will, "for that such devise taketh no effect till after the death of the devisor" (d).

VII.—Traitors and Felons.—By the Forfeiture Act, 1870, where any person has been sentenced to death or penal servitude upon any charge of treason or felony, the Crown may appoint an administrator of his property, and all real and personal property to which the convict becomes entitled between the date of his conviction and the completion of his sentence, or his pardon, vests in the administrator for the purposes of the act. Before this act, all property, both real and personal, accruing to a felon or traitor during the term above referred to, was forfeited to the Crown by virtue of its prerogative (g). After completion of the sentence or pardon, his right to acquire and hold property was restored to him (h).

Abolition for forfeiture for treason and felony.

VIII.—Unascertained Persons.—A gift to a person who is not ascertained at the date of the will is not invalid for that reason, unless the result would be to enable the testator to make a testamentary disposition by a subsequent unattested instrument, or by an act which is testamentary in its nature (i).

It may be added that an animal cannot take by devise or bequest, as appears clearly from the doctrine of our law with regard to monsters (j). It is equally clear, on principle, that an animal cannot be a cestui que vie for the purpose of creating an estate pur autre vie, or a "life" within the meaning of the Rule against Perpetuities (k). The question whether a trust can be created for the benefit of an animal is discussed in Chapter XXIV. A trust for the benefit of animals may be good as a charity (l).

lex rei sitæ.

THE remarks in this chapter as to the formalities required for a valid will, apply only to wills intended to operate according to the law of England. If the will of an English testator is intended to dispose of land situate out of England, it must be borne in mind that testamentary dispositions of immoveable property are governed by the lex rei sitæ (a), and accordingly care must be taken to ascertain and comply with the formalities required for the validity of wills by the law of the country where the property is situate. Sometimes, also, a doubt may arise whether an Englishman, who has been long resident abroad, has, at the time of making his will, an English or a foreign domicile; in such a case it will be prudent that the will should be in such form and so attested and executed as to be valid not only according to English law, but also according to the law of the foreign country by which it is apprehended that the disposition of his moveable property may possibly be regulated (b).

If the will of a person domiciled in a foreign country has been proved there, it will generally be accepted as valid by the Court of Probate here (c).

I.—Privileged Wills.—The only kind of privileged will now recognised by law (d) is a will made by a soldier or sailor in certain circumstances. Section 11 of the Wills Act enacts that any soldier being in actual military service, or any mariner or seaman being at sea, may dispose of his personal estate as he might have done before the making of the Act. A similar saving was contained in the Statute of Frauds (sect. 23); the operation of this saving has, to a considerable extent, been restricted by various statutes.

CHAPTER VI.

Wills made by soldiers and sailors.

By the Navy and Marines (Wills) Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 72), a will made by any seaman (e) or marine (f) or other person (g), belonging to His Majesty's naval or marine force, is not valid to pass any wages or other money payable by the Admiralty, or any effects or money in charge of the Admiralty, unless it is written and executed with the formalities required for ordinary wills, with the additional requirement that one of the attesting witnesses must (if the will is made on board one of His Majesty's ships) be a commissioned officer, chaplain or warrant or subordinate officer belonging to His Majesty's naval or marine or military force, or (if the will is made elsewhere) be an officer or chaplain of the rank above mentioned, or the governor, agent, physician, surgeon, assistant surgeon or chaplain of a naval hospital, or a justice of the peace, or the incumbent, curate or minister of a church or place of worship in the parish where the will is executed, or a British consular officer, or an officer of customs, or a notary public. Special provisions are made as to the execution of wills of seamen or marines while prisoners of war. Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions, if the will of a marine in actual military service, or a mariner or seaman at sea, is not made in conformity with them, the Admiralty may pay or deliver his wages, moneys or effects to any person claiming to be entitled thereto under such will, if, having regard to the special circumstances of the death of the testator, the Admiralty are of opinion that compliance with the requirements of the act may be dispensed with.

Subject to the provisions of these acts, the old law is still in force. Cases under it are of comparatively rare occurrence, and it will therefore be sufficient to state some of the more important rules (i).

Age of testator.

Any soldier or sailor coming within the exception contained in sect. 11 of the Wills Act, if over the age of fourteen years, may dispose of his goods and chattels, either by a written or by a nuncupative will (j).

Written will.

A written will is one which is written by the testator or committed to writing by his direction. It may be of the most informal character (k), and it does not require to be signed or even seen by him (l), but strict proof is required of the history of every alleged will, even if written and signed by the testator (m).

Nuncupative will.

A nuncupative will "is when the testator without any writing doth declare his will before a sufficient number of witnesses" (n).

Evidence required to prove nuncupative will.

A nuncupative will, in the proper sense of the term, requires to be proved by very clear and satisfactory evidence. In most, if not all, of the cases in which a nuncupative will has been admitted to probate, the testator was in extremis at the time of making it (o). But the term "nuncupative will" is often applied to an informal written will made by a soldier on active service.

Lapse of time.

It is said that a written will made by a soldier on active service sed quære.

An informal testamentary document may be proved as a soldier's will, although it contains an expression of intention to make a formal will at some future time (q). Provisional will.

Alterations in a soldier's will are presumed to have been made during military service (r). Alterations.

It has been held that a purser or surgeon in the navy comes within the description "mariner or seaman"; and it should seem that the term "mariner or seaman" includes every person in His Majesty's navy, as well the admiral or commander-in-chief as a common seaman (s). The expression "mariner or seaman" includes merchant seamen (t). Who is a "mariner or seaman."

A naval surgeon returning home from service invalided on a passenger steamer, is considered to be "at sea" within the meaning of the statute, but it does not follow that a seaman by profession, who is at sea on some occasion wholly dissociated from his profession, is entitled to the benefit of the statute (u). A ship in harbour or in a river has been held to be at sea within the meaning of the statute (v), and it is even said that if a sailor has joined a vessel and commenced a voyage in it, a will made in the course of that voyage is within the statute, although it was in fact made on shore (w). The term "soldier" includes officers (x) and surgeons, (y) but it has been held, on the construction of the words "any soldier being in actual military service," that the privilege is confined to those who are on an expedition (z). It will, therefore, not extend to an officer or soldier quartered in barracks at home or abroad (a); or to an officer on a tour of inspection of troops in his district (b). But the will of an officer or soldier on his way to join his regiment on active service (c), or made after an order to mobilise has been received (d), is within the statute. "At sea."

land.

II.—Ordinary Wills.—(a) Law before 1838.—The 5th section of the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3) required that all devises and bequests of any lands or tenements (e), devisable either by force of the Statute of Wills, or by that statute, or by force of the custom of Kent, or the custom of any borough, or any other particular custom, should be in writing and signed by the party so devising the same, or by some other person in his presence and by his express direction, and should be attested and subscribed in the presence of the said devisor, by three or four credible witnesses.

estate.

As regards personal estate, it has been already mentioned that before the Statute of Wills (stat. 1 Vict. c. 26) any person over the age of fourteen years could dispose of his goods and chattels by a written will. Nuncupative wills were not formally abolished by the Statute of Frauds, but were placed under such restrictions as practically abolished them (f), except in the case of wills made by soldiers and sailors (g). The statute did not interfere with written wills, for the validity of which, as already explained, neither the signature of the testator, nor any attestation, was necessary (h).

not within
Frauds.

Copyholds were held not to be within the clause in the Statute of Frauds, which required wills of land, &c., to be attested by three witnesses (i). The consequence was that any instrument which was adequate to the testamentary disposition of personal estate was sufficient for the devise of copyholds. And accordingly, not only did an unattested writing signed by the testator operate as an effectual devise of copyholds, but testamentary papers, neither authenticated by the signature, nor even in the handwriting of the testator, were adjudged to be sufficient if reduced to writing during the lifetime of the testator and by his direction. Equitable interests in copyholds were governed by the same rule (j).

Wills Act.

(b) Modern Law.—The statute 1 Vict. c. 26 (sect. 9), provides, "That no will shall be valid unless it shall be in writing, and executed in manner hereinafter mentioned ; (that is to say) it shall be signed

(e) Observe that the word "hereditaments" is omitted in this clause, though occurring in the next, see Buckridge v. Ingram, 2 Ves. jun. 662 ; but no question seems ever to have been raised on this omission. See further as to the law before 1838, the fourth edition of this work, pp. 77 et seq.

This statute has thus abolished all distinctions in regard to the mode of execution and attestation between the various species of property.

It will be observed, that though by the statute 1 Vict. c. 26, the ceremonial of execution is somewhat varied, yet several of its details remain unaltered, so that the cases decided under the Statute of Frauds, bearing upon the interpretation of the words "signature," "presence," "direction," "other person," "attested," "subscribed," which are common to both enactments, bear equally upon the interpretation of the same words in the statute of Victoria.

It may here be mentioned that if a will appears on the face of it to have been executed and attested in accordance with the requirements of the act, the maxim "omnia præsumentur ritè esse acta" applies, unless it is clearly proved by the attesting witnesses that the will was not in fact duly executed (k). But if the evidence is clear probate will be refused (l). Even where the document is informal (as where there is no attestation clause or the clause is incomplete) it may be assumed to have been duly executed (especially if it is a holograph will), although no evidence of its due execution is forthcoming (m). The question is further discussed in connection with the attestation clause (n).

Where a will has never been proved and has disappeared since the death of the testator, the maxim "omnia præsumentur" may be applied (o).

III.—Will must be in Writing.—The first condition requisite under the Wills Act to render valid any testamentary disposition, is that such disposition shall be "in writing." No particular form is required (p). A printed or lithographed form of a will, with or without blanks for names of legatees, amounts of legacies, &c., to be filled up in ink, satisfies this requirement of the act (q). Such instruments are constantly admitted to probate without question (r). But where a will is written on a printed form, probate may be granted of the written portion only, if it appears that the testator did not intend the printed portion to form part of his will (s). And even where the whole is admitted to probate, the fact that a printed or lithographed form has been used may affect the construction of the will (t). A will is not invalid by reason of blank spaces being left in it (u), or a blank page (v). Any difficulty which may arise by reason of the blanks, or any similar error, must be determined by the Court of Construction.

Writing includes printing, &c.

CHAPTER VI.

Blanks.

Will written in pencil.

And if blanks in a will (which is written in ink) are filled up in pencil before execution, the matter so inserted will be included in the probate (w).

Parol trust.

A will may be written in pencil (x). But where a printed form was filled up partly in ink and partly in pencil, and the writing in ink made sense with the form without help from the writing in pencil, part of which was written over by the ink, the ink writing alone was held to be the will (y). As to the effect of pencil alterations in a will written in ink, see below, pp. 157, 158.

Will affected ex postfacto.

The statutory requirement that a will must be in writing has been disregarded by the courts, in cases where it has been proved that a person to whom property has been given by will, holds it upon a parol trust (z).

There are also cases in which documents written by a testator after the execution of his will are allowed to affect its operation.

(w) Kell v. Charmer, 23 Bea. 195.

(x) The general rule is that what is written in pencil is prima facie deliberative, and under the old law, which allowed very informal wills of personality, the question often arose whether testamentary depositions in pencil were to be treated as final. As in the case of Bateman v. Pennington, 3 Moo. P. C. C. 223, where the will was written in ink and signed by the testator in pencil, but unattested. Such a case could not happen at the present day. See the cases on alterations in pencil cited in Chap. VII.

(y) In bonis Adams, L. R., 2 P. & D. 367. In bonis Bellamy, 14 W. R. 501, was a similar case, but it is too shortly reported to be of much value.

(z) See Chap. XXIV, where the case of In bonis Marchant, [1893] P. 254, is referred to.

Thus in Re Davy (a), it seems to have been assumed by all parties that a testator could, by making entries in his ledger, determine whether advances made by him to his children should be taken in part satisfaction of the bequests made to those children by his will. So in Townsend v. Townsend (b) memoranda made by a testatrix after the execution of her will were held admissible to shew (in effect) that by a gift of stock in the A. Company, she meant to bequeath stock in the B. Company.

IV.—Signature by Testator.—The next condition prescribed for the validity of a will is that it should be signed, which suggests the inquiry what amounts to a “signing” by the testator (c). It has been decided that a mark is sufficient (d), even if the testator is able to write (e), and though his name does not appear on the face of the will (f). A mark being sufficient, of course the initials of the testator’s name would also suffice (g). And it would be immaterial that he signed by a wrong or assumed name (since that name would be taken as a mark (h)), or that against the mark was written a wrong name (i), and that the testator was also wrongly named in the body of the will (j), or that his hand was guided in making the mark (k). But where an intending testator executes the wrong will by mistake, it has no testamentary effect (l).

Sealing alone will not as a general rule satisfy the statutory requirement that a will must be signed by the testator (m). But it is conceived that a distinctive seal, if shown to have been impressed by the testator with the design of authenticating the instrument, would be good as a signature by mark. And, accordingly, in an Irish case (n), a seal with the testator’s initials engraved thereon, impressed animo testandi, was held to be a sufficient signature.

Will must be signed.

Mark, a sufficient signing.

Initials.

Wrong name.

Wrong will.

Sealing, insufficient.

(b) 1 L. R. Ir. 180. This case is stated in Chap. XXXV.

(c) Of course, a testator can sign in pencil, as his signature or acknowledgment in the presence of witnesses would exclude all question as to the act being merely deliberative.

(d) The “mark” must leave a trace; it is not sufficient to point to or touch the paper with a dry pen: see Kevil v. Lynch, Ir. R. 8 Eq. 244, 9 ib. 249, where it was held (as a matter of fact) that a somewhat dubious kind of mark had been made.

CHAPTER VI.

Signature by
testator.

Both statutes expressly permit the testator's signature to be made by some other person by his direction, provided that it is made in his presence (o). That other person may, it seems, be one of the witnesses (p), and it is immaterial that he signed his own name instead of the name of the testator (q). And where the testator directed a person to sign the will for him, which that person did by writing at the foot, "this will was read and approved by C. F. B., by C. C. in the presence of &c.," and then followed the signatures of the witnesses, the will was held good (r). And on the ground that whatever would be good as a signature, if made by the testator, must be equally good if made by his direction, an impression of his name stamped by his direction was held good, as a mark would also have been (s).

of several
sufficient.

One signature, of course, is sufficient, though the will be contained in several sheets of paper (t); and it will generally be presumed that all the sheets were put together in the same order at the time of execution as at the testator's death (u); and that any apparent alteration in their order and paging was made before execution (v). This presumption may, of course, be rebutted (w). And in In bonis Madden (x), where the sheets were found pinned together, and the testatrix's signature and the attestation clause were on the first sheet, the Court came to the conclusion that the sheets had been inadvertently misplaced.

together.

It is not even necessary that the sheets of the will should be physically connected, or fastened or held together; if the evidence satisfies the Court that when the last sheet was signed and attested the other sheets were in the room, and that the testator treated them as together constituting his will, that is sufficient. In coming to this conclusion the Court may, if the evidence is conflicting or defective, draw inferences from the provisions of the will and other circumstances (y).

(r) In bonis Blair, 6 N. of C. 528.

But in Burke v. Moore, Ir. R. 9 Eq. 609, where the name of the testator was subscribed by B. by his direction, and the signature (but not the direction), was made in the presence of and attested by two witnesses, it was held that the will was not duly executed, partly, it seems, because the signature had not been acknowledged by the testator: sed quære. (x) [1905] 2 Ir. R. 612.

(y) Gregory v. Her Majesty's Proctor, 4 N. of C. 620. In that case the Court was assisted by the fact that the will was holograph. See In bonis M'Key,

But it seems that this rule does not apply unless a dispositive part of the will is contained on the sheet which bears the signature and attestation. The signature may indeed be on a separate piece of paper containing nothing but the signature and attestation, but in that case the piece of paper must be in some way "attached" to the will itself, and the fact of its having been so attached before execution must be proved (z). What degree of "attachment" is required does not seem to be satisfactorily settled. In In bonis Braddock (a), Hannen, Pres., seemed to think that the papers must be "physically connected," as with a piece of tape, or a pin (b): clearly paste or a wafer would be sufficient (c). But in Lewis v. Lewis (d), where the two sheets of paper alleged to contain the will (the signatures of the witnesses being on the first sheet, and the testator's signature on the second), were merely held together by the testator's finger and thumb, it was held by Bargrave Deane, J. that this was a sufficient attachment.

CHAPTER VI.
Signature and attestation on separate sheet.

In considering whether or not several pieces of paper constitute the will, declarations made by the testator both before and after execution are admissible to shew that it was his intention to make dispositions in conformity with those which are found upon the several sheets of paper (e).

Extrinsic evidence.

In a case where the testimonium at the end referred to the preceding sides of the sheet of letter paper as being subscribed by the testator, the fact of those sides not being so signed was held not to affect the validity of the will, as the testator evidently intended the signing and sealing of the last side to apply to the whole (f). But the signature must have been made with the design of authenticating the instrument; for it should seem that if the testator contemplated a further signature which he never made, the will must be considered as unsigned (g).

Conversely, if a testator has duly executed his will, and afterwards signs his name to it again, in the presence of two persons who also sign their names, it may appear from the circumstances that this was not intended as a re-execution of the will, but was done for some other purpose (h).

CHAPTER VI.

Having regard to the necessity (referred to in the next section of this Chapter) that the signature should not be above or precede the dispositive part of the will, it seems advisable, when a testator is in extremis, that the first or only signature should be at the end; for it has sometimes happened that a testator who has begun to sign the several sheets has expired or become insensible before he had reached the last.

Provision
signature to

V.—Position of Testator's Signature.—The statute 1 Vict. c. 26, as amended, has introduced a condition in this respect not formerly essential to the validity of a will, namely, that the signature of the testator must be somewhere near the end of the instrument, and so as not to be immediately over, or preceding any of the dispositive parts of the instrument, but it need not immediately follow or be under any of the dispositive parts; whereas formerly the signature might be in any part of the instrument. The provision in the original enactment requiring the signature of the testator to be at the “foot or end” of the will (which was evidently intended only to do away with the former rule that the name of the testator written in the commencement thus:—“I, A. B., do make, &c,” was a sufficient signature), seems at first to have answered the purpose intended; subsequently however, the Courts came to the conclusion that the words “foot or end” were to be construed strictly, and that if the signature did not immediately follow under the dispositive part of the will, and in such a manner that nothing could be written between the signature and the last words, the will was not properly executed (i). To obviate the inconveniences arising from these decisions, it was enacted by statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 24:—

“1. That where by an act of 1 Vict. (c. 26), it is enacted that no will shall be valid unless it shall be signed at the foot or end thereof by the testator or by some other person in his presence and by his direction, every will shall so far only as regards the position of the signature of the testator, or of the person signing for him as afore-said, be deemed to be valid within the said enactment, as explained by this act, if the signature shall be so placed at (j), or after, or following (k), or under, or beside, or opposite to (l) the end of the will, that it shall be apparent on the face of the will that the testator intended to give effect, by such his signature, to the writing signed as his will (m), and that no such will shall be affected by the circumstance that the signature shall not follow or be immediately (n) after the foot or end of the will, or by the circumstance that a blank space shall intervene between the concluding word of the will and the signature (o), or by the circumstance that the signature shall be placed among the words of the testimonium clause (p), or of the clause of attestation (q), either with or without a blank space intervening, or shall follow, or be after, or under, or beside, the attestation clause (qq), or the names (r), or one of the names, of the subscribing witnesses, or by the circumstance that the signature shall be on a side or page or other portion of the paper or papers containing the will, whereon no clause or paragraph or disposing part of the will shall be written above the signature (s), or by the circumstance that there shall appear to be sufficient space (t) on or at the bottom of the preceding side or page, or other portion of the same paper, on which the will is written, to contain the signature, and the enumeration of the above circumstances shall not restrict the generality of the above enactment; but no signature under the said act or this act shall be operative to give effect to any disposition or direction which is underneath, or which follows it (u): nor shall it give effect to any disposition or direction inserted after the signature shall be made (v).

In Trott v. Trott, 29 L.J.P. 156, the testator's name occurring as the last word of a holograph will, was held a sufficient signature. In Lewis v. Lewis, [1908] P. 1, the testator wrote the dispositive part of the will on one sheet of paper, and at the bottom of this the witnesses wrote their names; on the top of another sheet the testator wrote a kind of declaration as to the paper being his will, commencing, "I, David Lewis," he acknowledged this as his signature, and it was held to be a sufficient execution. The case is referred to ante, p. 109. In Sweetland v. Sweetland, 34 L.J.P. 42, the first five sheets were signed and attested, but not the sixth and last, and the whole was rejected. See also Margary v. Robinson, 12 P.D. 8; In bonis Hughes, ib. 107, in each of which cases the signature was written in the wrong place.

"2. The provisions of this act shall extend and be applied to every will already made, where administration or probate has not already been granted or ordered by a Court of competent jurisdiction, in consequence of the defective execution of such will, or where the property, not being within the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts, has not been possessed or enjoyed by some person or persons claiming to be entitled thereto, in consequence of the defective execution of such will, or the right thereto shall not have been decided to be in some other person or persons than the persons claiming under the will, by a Court of competent jurisdiction, in consequence of the defective execution of such will."

The wording of this statute may perhaps seem needlessly particular to the reader who has not consulted the decisions which led to its enactment; but it is unnecessary to treat of those decisions here, since the 2nd section of the statute renders it impossible that the validity of any will should now be determined by them.

VI.—Acknowledgment of Testator's Signature.—The statute 1 Vict. c. 26, placed the law with regard to the acknowledgment of wills on a new footing. The signature of the testator is to be

(u) In bonis Greated, 2 Jur. N. S. 1172; In bonis Dallow, L. R., 1 P. & D. 189; In bonis Woods, ib. 556; In bonis White, [1896] 1 Ir. R. 269; in all these cases the appointment of executors followed the signature. But in a few cases the Court has been satisfied by the mode of writing, or by the context, that a part which physically followed the signature belonged properly to that which preceded it, as in In bonis Ainsworth, L. R. 2 P. & D. 151. So where a sentence, which want of space prevented being completed at the bottom of a page, was continued, with an asterisk of reference, on a previous page, or at the back, In bonis Kimpton, 33 L. J. P. 153; In bonis Birt, L. R., 2 P. & D. 214 (the heir at law consented, but the decision is clearly wrong); and see In bonis Wilkinson, L. R., 6 P. D. 100 (alteration); In bonis Greenwood, [1892] P. 7. In In bonis Anstee [1893] P. 283, probate was granted of one page only of a will signed by the testator, containing an unfinished sentence completed on the next page. Compare In bonis White, 30 L. J. P. 55; In bonis Gee, 78 L. T. 843; In bonis Dearle, 47 L. J. P. 45; Millward v. Buswell, 20 T. L. R. 714. So where the will was written on the first and third sides, which it filled, and the signature was written cross-ways on the second: In bonis Coombs, L. R., 1 P. & D. 302. And where, a lithographed form occupying the first page, the will was written on and filled the second and third, but was signed in the form, this was held good, In bonis Wotton, L. R., 3 P. & D. 159. (See the remarks on this case in Royle v. Harris, [1895] P. 163, and compare In bonis Ffrench, 23 L. R. Ir. 433; In bonis Gilbert, 78 L. T. 762.) In all these cases it was proved that the part in question was written before execution. This proof failed in In bonis White, 30 L. J. P. 55, and the part was rejected. See also In bonis Dearle, 39 L. T. 93.

"made" or "acknowledged" (the "signature," and not, as formerly, the "will," being the subject of acknowledgment) in the simultaneous presence of the witnesses (w), whereas formerly the signature might be "made" before one, and the will acknowledged before the rest, or acknowledged before all the witnesses separately, without any of them having seen the signature.

As to this point, the following decisions have been made with regard to acknowledgment:—

(a) The signature to be acknowledged may be made by the testator, or by another for him (x).

(b) A testator, whether speechless or not, may acknowledge his signature by gestures (y).

(c) There is no sufficient acknowledgment unless the witnesses either saw or might have seen the signature (z), not even though the testator should expressly declare that the paper to be attested by them is his will (a).

(d) When the witnesses either saw or might have seen the signature, an express acknowledgment of the signature itself is not necessary, a mere statement that the paper is his will (b), or a direction to them to put their names under his (c), or even a request by the testator (d), or by some person in his presence (e), to sign the paper, is sufficient (f).

CHAPTER VI.

(e) When the signature is seen or expressly acknowledged, it is not material that the witnesses are not told that the instrument is a will (g), or are deceived into thinking that it is a deed (h).

(f) It is of course sufficient, on a re-execution, merely to acknowledge the signature made on a former execution (i).

VII.—Attestation and Subscription by Witnesses.—The next statutory requisition is, that the will (j) be “attested and subscribed” by the witnesses.

Simultaneous presence of witnesses.

It follows from what has been above stated that the will must be signed by or for the testator, and his signature must be acknowledged, before either of the witnesses signs (k). The signature must be made or acknowledged in the presence of the witnesses simultaneously, and not at different times (l), and they must themselves subscribe their names in the presence of the testator (m), though not necessarily in the presence of each other (n).

What a sufficient subscription ;
—initials ;

A mark has been decided to be a sufficient subscription (o) ; but it is never advisable, where it can be avoided (and, now that the art of writing is so common, seldom necessary), to employ marksmen as witnesses. The initials of the witnesses also amount to a sufficient subscription, if placed for their signatures, as attesting the execution (p) ; but not if they are placed in the margin opposite to, and apparently for the purpose only of identifying, alterations (q).

CHAPTER VI.

A witness need not sign his own name, if the name actually subscribed be intended to represent his name (r): or a description (without any name) is sufficient, if intended to identify him as witness (s). But if a wrong name be signed with the intention of making it appear that the will was attested by the person to whom that name belongs, instead of the actual witness, the subscription is insufficient (t). And if the witness signs part of his full name in such a way as to shew that he does not intend it as a complete signature, this is no attestation (tt). Sealing is not sufficient (u). If the witness cannot write, his hand may be guided by another person (v), or another person may write the witness's name while the witness holds the top of the pen (w); in fact, there seems to be no distinction in these respects between the words "sign" and "subscribe"; any act, therefore, which, as before noticed, would be a good signature by a testator, would be a good signature by a witness,—with, however, these exceptions, that the subscription of the witness is required to be made in the presence of the testator, and must not, as in the case of a testator, be a signature made by some other person for the witness, or by the witness himself at some other time, and merely acknowledged by him in the presence of the testator (x).

—wrong name;

Difference between signature by witness and by testator.

Where the will has been once attested by a witness, it is not sufficient for him, on a re-execution, to go over his name with a dry pen; he must do some act apparent on the face of the paper (y); otherwise it is no more than an acknowledgment. And where a witness to a former execution, on attesting a will for the second time, did not again write her name, but after her name written on the first execution, wrote the name of her residence, "Bristol," Sir H. J. Fust considered that to be no proof of the attestation, and decided that the will was not properly re-executed (z). So where a witness to a former execution, on attesting a re-execution of a will, wrote the day of the month against his former signature, and crossed one of the letters in it, not intending that the mark made by crossing the letter should stand for his signature, but supposing that the addition of the date was equivalent to a repetition of the signature, it was held by Sir C. Cresswell that the will was not duly re-executed (a). In these cases the attestation was insufficient, because there was no proof that the word "Bristol" in the one case, and the mark across the letter in the other, were intended to represent the witness's signature. They were nothing more than acknowledgments of the former signatures. The signature must be such as is descriptive of the witness, whether by a mark, or by initials, or by his full name (b), or by a description without name (c); a view which necessarily denies efficacy as a signature to the writing of the date.

Applicability of attestation to several distinct parts of a will;

The signature of the witnesses may be placed in any part of the will; for instance, the will ending on the first side of a sheet of letter paper, the witnesses may sign on the fourth side (d); and the will ending on the middle of the third side, and two of the witnesses signing at the end, and another signing in a vacant space on the second side opposite the other two, was held a sufficient attestation by three witnesses under the Statute of Frauds (e). And if the witnesses sign their names opposite alterations in the will, and not in the proper place, it may be proved by parol evidence that they intended to attest the testator's signature (f). So where they sign in a blank space in the body of the will (g). But it must of course be proved that any part of the will which follows the signatures of the witnesses was written before they signed (h). An attestation clause is not required (i).

A will may be composed of several clauses written at distinct intervals, and one memorandum of attestation subscribed to the last part may apply to the whole, including as well what was long before written as what had been recently added, though the antecedent part bears a different date, and is complete in itself, independently of the latter (j). And the same general doctrine applies to a will whose contents are distributed through several sheets of paper, which would be adequately attested by a single memorandum, provided all the detached parts were present when the act of attestation took place; and which fact it seems would be presumed, unless the contrary were distinctly proved (k), as would also that of the attestation being intended to apply to the whole. The presumption would be somewhat less strong, of course, when each of the several papers has a distinct independent character, as where one is a will and the other a codicil, or where they consist of two separate codicils: and would fail altogether where the memorandum does not follow the whole. Thus where will and codicil were on different sheets found pinned together, the codicil being signed by the testatrix but not attested, an attestation clause written on the back of the will was not held to be applicable to the codicil without proof that it was so intended, and that the sheets were pinned together at the time of subscription (l). So where there is an evident intention that each paper or sheet shall be separately attested; as, where a testator signed five sheets, and the witnesses subscribed the first four, and the fifth sheet contained an attestation clause only, and there was no evidence to show that the witnesses attested the last signature, the will was held not to have been properly executed (m); and where two instruments purporting to be a will and codicil were written on different pages of the same sheet of paper, and both were signed by the testatrix, but the first alone was attested, the codicil was rejected (n).

A will written in duplicate is not duly executed by the testator signing one copy, and the witnesses attesting and subscribing the other (o).

will.

In every case the Court must be satisfied that the names were written animo attestandi; and their position may for this purpose be material: where, for instance, on one page the will was written, signed by the testator and subscribed by one witness, and on the next page a memorandum or inventory of property was written, to which three names were subscribed, it was held that these names could not be deemed to have been so placed animo attestandi (p):

though it would not necessarily follow that a person did not sign as a witness because he also intended his signature to serve another purpose, e.g., his acceptance of the executorship (q).

Where an executed will was altered, and the witnesses put their initials in the margin opposite the alterations, it was held that the will was not properly re-executed (r). But this decision seems questionable, for the initials were intended to represent the signatures, and it was proved (extrinsic evidence being admissible on this question) that they were written with the intent to attest the will.

Sometimes it is important to prove that a person who writes his name on a will does not do so as witness ; for example, where he is a legatee under the will (s).

of testator.

VIII.—Subscription in “ Presence ” of Testator.—The will, it will be observed, is required to be subscribed by the witnesses, in the “ presence ” of the testator (t). The design of the legislature, in making this requisition, evidently was, that the testator might have ocular evidence of the identity of the instrument subscribed by the witnesses ; and this design has been kept in view by the Courts in fixing the signification of the word “ presence.” To constitute “ presence,” in the first place, it is essential that the testator should be mentally capable of recognising the act which is being performed before him ; for, if this power be wanting, his mere corporal presence would not suffice. Thus, if a testator, after having signed and published his will, and before the witnesses subscribe their names, falls into a state of insensibility (whether permanent or temporary) the attestation is insufficient (u).

Mental con-

And the testator ought not merely to possess the mental power of recognising, but be actually conscious of, the transaction in which the witnesses are engaged ; for if a will were attested in a secret and clandestine manner, without the knowledge of the testator, the fact of his being in the room in which it was done would not avail (v). Nor, on the other hand, would the circumstance of the testator not being in the same room invalidate the attestation, if it took place within his view. Thus, in the case of Shires v. Glascock (w), the testator being in extreme illness, the witnesses after he had signed his will withdrew into a gallery, between which and the testator's chamber there was a lobby with glass doors, and the glass broken in some places; in this gallery the witnesses subscribed the will; it was proved that the testator might have seen from his bed, through the lobby and the broken glass window, the table in the gallery where the witnesses subscribed; and this was adjudged to be sufficient; for (it was observed) the statute required attesting in his presence to prevent obtruding another will in place of the true one; here the signing was within view of the testator; he might have seen it, and that was enough. And if the witnesses subscribe their names in the same room where the testator lies, though the curtain of the bed be drawn close, it is a good subscribing, because it is in his power to see them, and what is done shall be construed to be in his presence (x).

Sufficient if the testator might have seen.

It is not even necessary that the testator should be in the same house with the witnesses. In Casson v. Dade (y), where a feme covert, having power to make a writing in the nature of a will, executed the instrument in her carriage outside her attorney's office, the witnesses attending her; after having seen the execution, they returned into the office to subscribe it; and it was sworn by a person in the carriage that the testatrix might have seen what passed through the window of the office: Lord Thurlow was of opinion that the will was well executed.

Testator and witnesses need not be in same house.

Upon the same principle it is clear, that the mere contiguity of the places occupied by the testator and the witnesses respectively will not suffice, if the testator's view of the witnesses' proceedings is necessarily obstructed. Thus, in Eccleston v. Petty (z), where the witnesses proved that the testatrix signed the will in her bed-chamber, and they subscribed it in the hall, and it was not possible from her chamber to see what was done at the table in the hall, there being a passage and eight or ten turning stairs between those places, the will was held not to be duly attested (a).

Mere contiguity not sufficient, if the testator's view be interrupted.

And it was not enough, that in another part of the same room the testator might have perceived the witnesses, if in his actual position he could not (b). And, therefore, in Doe d. Wright v. Manifold (c), where the testator was in bed in a room, from one part of which he might, by inclining his head into the passage, have seen

CHAPTER VI. the witnesses attest the will, but not in the situation in which he was, the attestation was decided not to be good. Lord Ellenborough said :—" In favour of attestation it is presumed, that if the testator might see, he did see ; but I am afraid, that if we get beyond the rule which requires that the witnesses should be actually within reach of the organs of sight, we shall be giving effect to an attestation out of the devisor's presence, as to which the rule is, that where the devisor cannot by possibility see the act doing, that is out of his presence."

Where a testator is unable to move without assistance ;
—where he is blind.

If the testator be unable to move without assistance, and have his face turned from the witnesses, so that it is out of his power to see them, if he so wished, the attestation will be insufficient (d). Where the testator is blind, it has been decided that the position of the witnesses must be such, that the testator, if he had had his eyesight, might have been able to see them sign (e).

Where the evidence fails to show in what part of the room the subscription took place, it would be presumed that the most convenient was the actual spot, and the ordinary position of a table, likely to have been used, would be taken into consideration (f).

It is scarcely necessary to add, that the nature of the occasion of the witnesses' absence, whether for the ease or at the solicitation of the testator or otherwise, is wholly immaterial (g).

Due execution when presumed.

IX.—Attestation Clause unnecessary.—A form of attestation is expressly dispensed with by the statute 1 Vict. c. 26. No particular form of words was essential even under the old law to constitute an attestation (h). And accordingly, probate has been granted of a will where both the witnesses deposed that the requirements of the act had not been complied with, the Court being satisfied by the circumstances that the evidence was mistaken (i) ; and in another case, where the witnesses so deposed, but not positively, their evidence was allowed to be rebutted by that of another person present at the execution, assisted by the attestation clause, whence it appeared that the requirements of the statute had been complied with (j). And in a case where the attestation clause stated that the will was signed in the presence of the attesting witnesses, and it appeared from the evidence that it was only acknowledged in their presence, having been signed before they were called in, probate was granted (k). But where there was nothing but a formal attestation clause on one side, and the adverse testimony of both witnesses on the other, probate was refused (l).

As a general rule, the presumption of compliance with the statutory requirements will not be made, unless the will appears on the face of it to have been duly executed. But if the will is found among the testator's papers at his death, and there are no suspicious circumstances, due execution may be presumed, even if there is no attestation clause (m). And in a recent case (n), where the will was signed by the testatrix and two other persons (both of whom were dead), without any attestation clause, the rule "omnia præsumentur rite esse acta" enabled the Court to hold the will duly executed, although there was no evidence to prove the handwriting of one of the alleged witnesses. If the will is lost, due execution must be proved (o), and the testator's written declarations of the fact are insufficient, though accompanied by a document referred to by him as a copy of his will, and representing the will as duly executed (p). The presumption of due execution is clearly rebutted where it is sworn by competent persons that the names of the

The provision in the statute 1 Vict. c. 26, enacting that no form of attestation shall be necessary, has been much observed upon; but it seems to mean only that no clause need be appended to the will, stating that the requirements of the act have been complied with (r); and is not inconsistent with the provision that the witnesses are to "attest," as well as subscribe the will, the word "attest" meaning merely to act as a witness, which might in fact be done without subscription (s); although upon the construction of the act it may be that no attestation will satisfy its requirements, except through the outward mark of subscription (t). The "subscription," "attestation," and "form of attestation," thus refer to matters essentially different (u).

Still, it will be the duty of persons who superintend the execution of wills, not to be content with a bare subscription of the witnesses' names, but to make them subscribe a memorandum of attestation, recording the observance of all the circumstances which the statute makes necessary to constitute a valid execution; (i.e., that the signature was made, or acknowledged, by the testator in the presence of the witnesses, both being present at the same time, and that they subscribed their names in his presence); for, though such statement in the memorandum of attestation is not conclusive, and does not preclude inquiry into the fact, it would afford a much stronger presumption that the statutory requisition had been complied with, than where it is wanting; and in the absence of such a memorandum, the witnesses are always called upon by the Court of Probate to make an affidavit that the statute was in fact complied with. It will not be advisable for a testator, except where absolutely necessary, to avail himself of the privilege, which the Wills Act expressly confers, of acknowledging the signature before the witnesses, instead of signing it in their presence, or of the permission to sign by the hand of another. The latter expedient, indeed, ought to be restricted in practice (though the legislature has not so limited it) to cases of extreme physical weakness, rendering it impossible or difficult for the testator to write his name ; in such cases, even the exertion of making a mark might be oppressive. Where a testator is unable to write from ignorance, perhaps a mark is to be preferred to a signature by the hand of another, as being the more usual mode of execution by illiterate persons ; for in regard to this and all other particulars, the prudent course is to make the execution of the will conform as much as possible to the testator's ordinary mode of executing instruments. Where the will is signed by a third person on behalf of the testator, the signature, of course, should, though, as we have before seen, it need not necessarily, be in the name of the testator, rather than that of the amanuensis, who should merely be designated in the memorandum of attestation ; where it would be proper (though not necessary) that the peculiar mode of execution should be stated.

(u) An attestation clause, if used, is no part of the will, and any words in the clause purporting to describe the operation of a testamentary instrument, such as "whereby the first codicil is cancelled," do not affect the construction or effect of the instrument: In bonis Atkinson, L. R., 8 P. D. 165.

CHAPTER VI.

As to signing by mark, or by amanuensis.

X.—Number of Witnesses.—Wills of real and personal estate are now subject to the same rule as to the ceremonial of execution, and such rule differs from that which previously obtained in regard to either species of property ; two witnesses, instead of three, as formerly, are required to a will of freehold land, and two witnesses are also necessary to a will of personal estate or copyholds, which formerly required no attestation.

Two witnesses required.

XI.—Credibility of Witnesses.—It will be observed, that in the clause above stated, which regulates the attestation of wills, the legislature has dropped the requisition of credibility, as an ingredient in the qualification of the witnesses ; and has, moreover, (s. 14,) expressly provided, that if any person who shall attest the execution of a will shall, at the time of the execution thereof, or at any time afterwards, be incompetent to be admitted a witness, to prove the execution thereof, such will shall not on that account be invalid.

Attesting witnesses not required to be credible.

“ It seems to have been generally considered,” Mr. Jarman remarks (v), “ that this provision not only qualifies persons who have been rendered infamous by conviction for crime to be attesting witnesses (as it clearly does), but, that it even gives validity to the attesting act of an idiot or lunatic. This, however, seems very questionable. The signature, it will be observed, is required to be made or acknowledged by the testator in the presence of the witnesses ; which would seem to imply that they should be mentally conscious of the transaction, according to the construction which was given (as we have seen (w)) to the same word occurring in the devise clause of the Statute of Frauds, which required that the attesting witnesses should subscribe in the testator's 'presence'; such requisition being held not to be satisfied in a case, in which the testator fell into a state of insensibility, before the witnesses had subscribed their names to the memorandum of attestation; and the 14th section of the recent statute seems to be perfectly consistent with such a construction; for that clause does not in terms dispense with all personal qualifications in the witnesses to perform the act; it only removes the legal disqualification, arising out of his incompetency to give evidence of the fact in a judicial proceeding, which evidently may co-exist with intellectual capacity, as in the case of a person whose credibility of character has been destroyed by conviction for crime, a species of disqualification which was peculiarly inconvenient, as the testator might have been unaware of its existence, so that there was a special reason for its removal, which does not apply to palpable infirmity. Surely, if the legislature intended to enact so novel (not to say absurd) a doctrine, as that the functions of an attesting witness might be performed by any one who could scratch a paper without the least glimmering of intellectual consciousness, this would have been done in terms more clear and explicit, than by providing that persons incompetent to be admitted as witnesses to prove the execution of a will, should be sufficient attestators—expressions which seem rather to suppose a personal ability on the part of the witnesses to perform the act, but a legal disability to prove it. Perhaps the point is not very likely to occur in practice; for no testator would think of choosing an idiot (x) or lunatic as an attesting witness to his will, unless he were content to have his own sanity called in question. And here it may be observed, that the enlarged licence now given, in regard to the qualification of witnesses to wills, will

(w) Ante, p. 118, n., and see the judgment of Dr. Lushington in Hudson v. Parker, 1 Rob. 14, 8 Jur. 786.

(x) "Supposing such persons to be, technically speaking, competent attesting witnesses, the effect of employing two such witnesses would be to render it necessary to have recourse to the testimony of other persons, for the purpose of proving the circumstances of the execution, which could not, in such case, be done (as it usually is) out of the mouths of the witnesses themselves; and it is to be observed that, although in the case of a deceased witness, proof of handwriting is sufficient, the presumption being, that the will was duly attested, especially if the facts essential thereto were recorded in a memorandum of attestation, which was subscribed by the deceased, yet it does not follow that any such presumption would arise in the case of a lunatic witness, whose subscription (though his handwriting might be proved), could not be considered as affording any security that attention had been paid to the requisitions of the statute."

not induce any prudent person to abate one jot of scrupulous anxiety that the duty of attesting a will be confided to persons, whose character, intelligence, and station in society, afford the strongest presumption in favour of the fairness and proper management of the transaction ; and preclude all apprehension in purchasers and others, as to the facility with which the instrument could be supported in a court of justice, against any attempt to impeach it ; and now that the requisite number of witnesses is reduced to two, it is the more easy, as well as important, that the selection should be governed by a regard to such considerations. A devise or bequest to an attesting witness still, as under the old law, does not affect the validity of the entire will, but merely invalidates the gift to the witness, whose competency the legislature has established, by destroying his interest ; and hence the remarks on this enactment have more properly found a place in a preceding chapter, which treats of the disqualifications of devisees " (y).

XII.—Alterations.—Owing to the general rule that alterations, interlineations, &c., made in a will, are presumed to have been made after execution, it is always advisable, when alterations are made in a will before execution, to identify them by the initials of the testator and witnesses, or by a reference to them in the attestation clause. This matter is considered in the next Chapter, in connection with the subject of alterations made after execution.

Should be identified.

Unattested alterations in a will may be incorporated by reference or implication in a codicil (yy).

Unattested alterations.

XIII.—Incomplete Wills.—Cases sometimes occurred under the old law, and may possibly arise under the present, in which something more than a mere compliance with legal requirements was made necessary to the efficacy of the will by the testator himself, he having chosen to prescribe to himself a special mode of execution ; for in such case, if the testator afterwards neglects to comply with the prescribed formalities, the inference to be drawn from these circumstances is, that he had not fully and definitively resolved on adopting the paper as his will (z). The presumption is slight where the instrument is duly signed and attested, and perfect in all other respects, but must apparently be rebutted by some evidence before it can be admitted to probate (a).

Where, however, the testator's design of perfecting the paper is frustrated by sudden death, or insanity, or any other involuntary preventing cause, no inference of the absence of matured testamentary intention arises from the imperfect state of the document, which, therefore, notwithstanding its defect, will be accepted as the will of the deceased, provided it fully discloses his testamentary scheme (b).

But this doctrine in favour of imperfect papers obtains only where the defect is in regard to some formal act, which the testator has prescribed as necessary for the authentication of his will, and not where it applies to the contents of the instrument; for, if in its actual state the paper contains only a partial disclosure of the testamentary scheme of the deceased, it necessarily fails of effect, even though its completion was prevented by circumstances beyond his control (c).

In short, the presumption is always against a paper which bears self-evident marks of being unfinished; and it behoves those who assert its testamentary character distinctly to show, either that the deceased intended the paper in its actual condition to operate as his will, or that he was prevented by involuntary accident from completing it (d). And probate will not be granted of such defective papers, without the consent or citation of the next of kin (e).

It ought to be observed, however, that we are not to rank among inchoate or unfinished testamentary papers, one which is shown

Stewart, 2 Moo. P. C. C. 193. Questions as to the testamentary validity of incomplete papers rarely occur in practice, now that authentication of signature and attestation is essential to such validity.

(a) Per Sir J. Nicholl in Beatty v. Beatty. See also 1 Wms. Exors., Pt. I., Bk. II., Ch. II., s. 2. It is obvious that such cases are not very likely to occur under the present law, and indeed the point does not even seem to have as yet arisen.

(c) Montefiore v. Montefiore, 2 Add. 354; see also Griffin v. Griffin, 4 Ves. 197, n. This case afforded two sufficient grounds for the rejection of the paper; first, that it was not the whole will; and, secondly, that its completion was not prevented by inevitable circumstances. But loss of part of a will once complete does not necessarily exclude the remainder from probate, Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards, 1 P. D. 154; unless it substantially alters the sense of the remainder, e. g., where a gift of residue alone remains, the part containing gifts of legacies being lost, see Woodward v. Goulstone, 11 App. Ca. 469.

to have been intended to perform the office of a present will (if the expression may be allowed), though executed for a temporary purpose, as appears by the testator having designated it a "memorandum of an intended will," or "head of instructions," or "a sketch of an intended will which I intend to make when I get home," &c. And it has frequently occurred that a testator has ultimately adopted as his final will a paper so originally designed as instructions for, or in contemplation of, a more formal testament (f).

In all such cases, however, the Ecclesiastical Court required very distinct evidence of a testator eventually adhering to and adopting, as his deliberate will, the preliminary document, in case he afterwards lived long enough to have executed a more complete instrument (g). But cases of this kind depend so much upon their particular circumstances, that little is to be learnt from general statements; and the inquirer into the subject is recommended to consult the cases referred to in the notes, a full statement of which the limits of the present work do not allow (h).

The execution of testamentary powers is treated of in Chapter XXIII.

XIV.—Defective Execution supplied by Reference, express or implied.—It remains to be considered in what cases a codicil, duly attested, communicates the efficacy of its attestation to an unattested will or previous codicil, so as to render effectual any devise or bequest which may be contained in such prior unattested instrument. It was repeatedly decided, in cases not affected by the Wills Act, where the several attested and unattested instruments were written on the same paper, that the latter were rendered valid (i). In these cases the attested codicil referred to the unattested document. Without a reference of some kind the mere fact that the two instruments are written on the same piece of paper, the attested one after the other, is not sufficient to incorporate them (j). But a very slight reference is sufficient (k).

CHAPTER VI.

Remarks upon the preceding cases.

Where the
document
referred to.

The result would have been the same if the unattested will and the attested codicil had been detached; the only effect of their being united in the same paper being to render unnecessary any express reference to the unattested document for the purpose of identifying it. The observations which fell from the Court of K. B. in Utterton v. Robins (l) indicate a strong inclination in that Court to this opinion. And the point is not now open to question. Thus in Aaron v. Aaron (m), a testator made a will and two codicils, each on a separate paper; the first codicil was unattested; by the second the testator recited his will dated &c., and a codicil annexed thereto and dated &c., and described it as a second codicil to his said will: this codicil was duly attested, and it was held by Sir K. Bruce, V.-C., that the first codicil was set up by the second. It could make no difference, he observed, whether the codicil was written on the same paper as the will or not; a codicil was referred to, and there was no dispute what the instrument was.

It should seem, however, that where the attested codicil is detached from, and does not refer to, the unattested will or previous codicil, it will not have the effect of curing the defective execution of such prior testamentary document.

Thus, in In bonis Marchant (n), the testatrix left two testamentary documents, the first of which contained directions as to the disposition of her property, and appointed A. as executor, but was not executed by her: the second bequeathed all her property to B. "for the purposes I require him to do absolutely." This was duly executed as a will. It was held that the first document was not incorporated in the second, but probate was granted to A. to administer the property according to the trusts of the first document.

Again, in Utterton v. Robins (o), where a testator, by several unwitnessed memoranda, subsequent to his will, which was duly attested, left a freehold house, which, among other estates, he had acquired since the date of the will, to his daughter, and afterwards made the following codicil, which was duly attested:—"I make this a further codicil to my will, which bears date 12th Sept., 1823; I give and devise all real estates, purchased by me since the execution of my said will, to the trustees therein named, their heirs, &c., to the uses and upon the trusts therein expressed concerning the residue of my real estates ; ” it was certified on a case from Chancery, that the house passed to the trustees and not to the daughter.

In this case the language of the second codicil seemed to repel the supposition that the testator intended the estates purchased since the execution of the will to pass by the prior codicil ; unless, indeed, when he speaks of his “ will,” he is to be understood (p) as referring to all the prior testamentary documents, including the unattested codicil, according to the principle laid down by Shadwell, V.-C., in Gordon v. Lord Reay (q), where a testator, by a second codicil (which was duly attested), after reciting his will (which was also duly attested) by date, expressly confirmed all his provisions and bequests in it in favour of a certain individual : and the V.-C. was of opinion that this confirmation had the effect of entitling her to the benefit of a charge created on his freehold estates, by a prior unattested codicil, on the ground that the second codicil amounted to a republication (r) of the first. “ The first codicil,” he said, “ is part of the will, and if the second codicil is a republication of the will, it is a republication of everything that is part of the will. The second codicil does refer to the will ; it ratifies and confirms the will and everything that is part of it.”

“ will ” includes a codicil added

But this decision seems to be erroneous, because, as Jessel, M.R., pointed out (s), the second codicil did not refer to the testator’s will in general terms : “ the only reference,” said the M. R., “ was to a will bearing date a certain day, that is, as I understand it, to a described instrument, which excludes instruments of subsequent date. . . . It may well be, that where you describe a will generally without date, and say, ‘ I confirm my will,’ you might interpret the word ‘ will ’ as including the whole of the testamentary disposition (t) ; but it does appear to me that that was not the case in Gordon v. Lord Reay.” In Burton v. Newbery, the testator made his will, and then made a (p) Not that he was in fact so understood ; the Court shewed not obscurely that it thought there was no sufficient reference to the will. Besides, the testator had not purchased any real estate since the execution of his “ will ” in the wider sense.

codicil which was attested by A. and B., who took benefits under the codicil, and afterwards made another codicil "to my last will dated," &c., which was duly attested, but did not refer to the prior codicil (all these instruments being on separate papers), and it was held by the M.R. that the second codicil did not republish the first, and, consequently, that the gifts to A. and B. under the first codicil failed. But the decision is not relevant to the present discussion (u).

Since the statute 1 Vict. c. 26, the point discussed in Gordon v. Lord Reay can hardly arise, because an unattested paper is not now, as it formerly was, admissible to probate, and cannot properly be regarded as part of the will, or as a codicil to it.

If a testator makes several codicils, some of which are, but others are not, duly attested, a subsequent codicil confirming "his will and codicils" confirms only the duly attested codicils. This point was determined in Croker v. Marquis of Hertford (v). Dr. Lushington delivered the judgment of the Privy Council, and said, that "the strict and primary sense of the word 'codicil' was a testamentary instrument which would, per se, become valid immediately on the death of the testator; that the words of the codicil in the case before him, when so interpreted, were sensible with reference to extrinsic circumstances; for there were codicils duly executed so as to come within the strict and primary sense; therefore, according to the rule of construction stated by Mr. Wigram (w), however capable the words might be of another and popular interpretation, or however strong the intention of the testator, the strict and primary sense must be adhered to." On the same principle, Sir H. J. Fust held (x), that codicils not duly attested, though written on the same paper as the will, were not ratified by a codicil of subsequent date which referred only to the will. But, as was implied in the reasons given for those decisions, the case is different where there is no instrument which satisfies the strict meaning of the words of reference. Another rule of construction stated by the same learned writer (y) then prevails. For where there is nothing in the context of a will to make it apparent that a testator has used words in any other than their strict and primary sense, but his words, so interpreted, are insensible with reference to extrinsic circumstances, the Court may look into the extrinsic circumstances to see whether the meaning of the words be sensible in any popular or secondary sense, of which with reference to these circumstances they are capable. Accordingly, in Ingoldby v. Ingoldby (2), where there was a paper purporting to be a codicil, and subsequently the testator duly executed a codicil not referring to the paper, except by being called "another codicil to my will," Sir H. J. Fust held that the first paper, purporting to be a codicil, was thereby rendered valid, and he distinguished the case from Croker v. Marquis of Hertford, on the ground that there were not, as in that case, any duly executed codicils to which the last codicil could be held to refer. But it would seem that the commencement of a series of documents with the words "This is a first," "second," "third codicil," would not of itself be sufficient to render valid an intermediate document which is not duly executed or attested (a).

In Allen v. Maddock (b), the subject was fully discussed by Lord Kingsdown. In that case a will was made and signed in the presence of one witness only. Afterward the testatrix made a codicil which commenced—"This is a codicil to my last will and testament," and was duly executed. No other will having been found, it was held by the Judicial Committee, upon parol evidence of the circumstances, that the two papers, as together containing the will and codicil, were entitled to probate. From Lord Kingsdown's judgment, it is clear that the question whether an imperfectly executed paper is made effectual by a later perfectly executed one, depends on the question whether the earlier paper is incorporated in the later: in other words, whether the reference be such as, with the assistance (if necessary) of parol evidence of the circumstances, to be sufficient to identify it. Difficulties will of course sometimes arise upon the evidence (c); for instance, a reference by a testator to his last will, or to a first or second codicil, is a reference in its own nature to one instrument to the exclusion of all others, and the description identifies the instrument (d), but a general reference to codicils, of which there may be several, is different, and probably not easy to render effectual by extrinsic evidence. But where the parol evidence sufficiently proves that, in the existing circumstances, there is no doubt as to the instrument, it is no objection to the admission of the evidence that by possibility circumstances might have existed in which the instrument referred to could not have been identified. In short, any unattested paper which would have been incorporated in an attested will or codicil executed according to the Statute of Frauds, is now in the same manner incorporated if the will or codicil is executed according to the requirements of the Act of 1 Vict. c. 26, but with this important distinction, that since that act an unattested codicil is not part of the will for any purpose, and consequently is not incorporated or confirmed by a codicil of subsequent date referring only to the will. The decision in Allen v. Maddock (e) has been adopted and followed in the recent case of In bonis Heathcote (f).

The principle being thus the same under both statutes, it follows that, subject to the distinction just noted, the circumstance of the well-executed instrument being written on the same paper as the imperfectly executed one, must still be regarded as materially helping to identify the latter as the document referred to by the former (g). And a distinction may fairly be drawn between a case where the later and well-executed instrument contains a reference, more or less particular, to another document, and a case where the later and well-executed instrument contains no express reference to any other; in the latter case the mere circumstance of its being on the same paper with others may possibly furnish ground for implying a reference to all the others, so as to incorporate and set up all. Such appears to have been the case in Guest v. Willasey (h), where the third codicil was thus—"I now appoint A. to be my executor in the room of B. above mentioned, with full power to act, &c. Witness my hand." So in In bonis Catrall (i), where, underneath his will, a testator wrote and signed some unattested additions; and under these he afterwards wrote some further additions, which were duly signed and attested; it was held by Sir W. P. Wilde that the presumption was that this signature and attestation were intended to apply, and that they gave effect, to all that went before. But this presumption is rebutted by an express reference of narrower scope. Thus, a reference to the "will" does not set up an unattested writing, though all three are on the same paper, the unattested writing, as we have seen, not being a part of the will (j).

CHAPTER VI.

An unexecuted alteration in a will is not rendered valid by a codicil ratifying and confirming the will, unless in such codicil the alteration be specially referred to (k), or unless it be proved affirmatively by extrinsic evidence, that the alteration was made before the codicil (l); and even then, if it appear to be deliberative only, it will not be included in the probate (m).

Unexecuted alterations when rendered valid by subsequent codicil.

A codicil which is only to take effect in an event which does not happen, may nevertheless have the effect of setting up an unattested will to which it refers (n).

Conditional codicil.

Cases in which there is reference to an existing paper, it is obvious, stand upon quite a different footing from those in which a testator (as often occurred under the old law) attempts to create, by a will duly attested, a power to dispose by a future unattested codicil. To allow such a codicil to become supplementary to the contents of the will itself, would, it is obvious, tend to introduce all the evils against which the Statute of Frauds was directed, and, indeed, give to the will an operation in the testator's lifetime, contrary to the fundamental law of the instrument. Accordingly, where a testator by a will, attested by three witnesses, devised his real estate to trustees, upon trust (subject to certain limitations thereby created) to convey the same to such persons and for such estates as he by deed or will, attested by two witnesses, should appoint; and the testator, professing to exercise this assumed power, executed an instrument attested by two witnesses, which he styled a deed-poll, and thereby carried on the series of limitations commenced in his will: it was decided, after much consideration, that this instrument operated as a codicil to the will, and, consequently, was incapable of affecting the freehold lands, for want of an attestation by three witnesses (o).

Testator cannot by his will empower himself to dispose by an unattested codicil.

Devisee to be ascertained by future event or act.

In Stubbs v. Sargon (p) it was contended that, on the same principle, a devise of realty to "the persons who shall be in co-partnership with me at the time of my decease, or to whom I shall have disposed of my business," was void, as leaving it for the testator by some further act, not authorised by the Statute of Frauds, to select the devisee. But Lord Langdale, and on appeal Lord Cottenham, held the devise good. Lord Cottenham compared the case to that of a father having two sons, and devising his property to such one of them as should not become entitled to an estate from a third person; here the act of a third person determines who shall take the father's estate. But the act is not testamentary; if it were, one man would be making another man's will. And if not testamentary when done by a third person, it cannot be so when done by the testator himself; otherwise a testator could not devise to such person as, at his death, should be his wife or servant. And Lord Langdale said, if the description was such as to distinguish the devisee from every other person, it was sufficient without entering into the question whether the description was acquired by the devisee after the date of the will, or by the testator's own act in the ordinary course of his affairs, or in the management of his property.

The act must not be testamentary.

The question is, therefore: Is the supplementary act testamentary? If it is, the devise is void; if it is not, then, although it is the sole act of the testator, the devise is good.

The point frequently arises where a testator by his will directs part of his property to be disposed of in such way as he shall by letter, memorandum, &c., or the like, direct; it is clear that no such document can have any testamentary operation, unless executed as a will, or incorporated by a subsequent will or codicil (r).

The cases above referred to must be distinguished from those in which the Courts have given a testamentary operation to unattested documents under the doctrine of trusts (s).

evidence to prove a trust, see post, Chap. XV. In Metham v. Duke of Devon, 1 P. W. 530, a testator directed his executors to pay a sum of money as he should by deed appoint; and subsequently, by a deed referring to the will, he made an appointment, which the Court held to be valid, on the ground that the deed was a part of the will, and in the nature of a codicil. The report does not state whether the deed was admitted to probate, as of course it ought to have been.

(s) See Chap. XXIV. There are also cases (referred to ante, pp. 106-7) in which documents written by the testator after the execution of the will are allowed to affect its operation.

CHAPTER VI.

Reference to extrinsic documents allowable.

XV.—Incorporation of Non-testamentary Documents.—The rule that a document may be incorporated in a will by reference, is not confined to unattested wills and other documents intended to have a testamentary operation, but extends to any document referred to by a testator in order to elucidate or to explain his intention. The document, if sufficiently identified, is then said to be incorporated in the will. Thus where a person by his will devises all the lands which were conveyed to him by a certain indenture (specifying the deed), or devises lands to the uses declared by a particular indenture of settlement, it is clear that the indentures so referred to may be consulted for this purpose, without violating the principle of the enactment, which requires an attestation by witnesses, the testator's intention to adopt the contents of such instrument being manifested by a will duly attested (t); and it would, it is conceived, be immaterial whether the paper so referred to was in the testator's handwriting, or in that of any other person, and whether it professed to be testamentary or not, as it founds its claim to be received as part of the will, not on its own independent efficacy, but on the fact of its adoption by the attested will.

But whatever be the precise nature of the document referred to, it must be clearly identified as the instrument to which the will points (u). Two things are necessary: first, that the will should refer to some document as then in existence (v); secondly, proof that the document propounded for probate was, in fact, written before the will was made, and was identical with that referred to in the will.

Requisites for incorporation.

(i.) As to the first point, a clause which "ratifies and confirms a deed, dated, &c., and made between &c.," answers this requirement and incorporates the deed (w). But there should be no ambiguity. A reference to a document as "made or to be made" gives strong ground for concluding that the document had not already been made (x). So a reference to persons or things "hereinafter named" (y), or to "the annexed schedule" (z), is not so clear a reference to any document as then existing as to incorporate writings that follow the signature of the testator and of the witnesses, although it be proved that, in fact, such writings were in existence before the will was executed; much less if the evidence on this last point is hesitating (a). Again, if a testator attempts to dispose of chattels by referring to them in his will as "articles of personal use, the destination or gift of which may by memoranda or labels thereon be indicated," this is nugatory (b). And if the will refers to a document as a future document, and the testator afterwards executes a codicil confirming the will, the document is not thereby incorporated, although it was in fact written before the date of the codicil (c). The will must be so worded that, speaking from the date of the codicil, it shall refer to the document as then existing (d).

1. Will must refer to a document as then existing.

2. The document referred to must be proved to have existed at the date of the will.

(ii.) With regard to the evidence necessary to prove that the document propounded for probate was in existence at the date of the will, and that it is the same as that which is referred to therein: if the reference is distinct (e.g., to date, heading, and other particulars), and if the document propounded agrees in these particulars with the description contained in the will, its previous existence and identity will, in the absence of circumstances or evidence tending to a contrary conclusion, be assumed (e). Where the reference is less distinct, yet if it be in terms sufficiently definite to render the document capable of identification, extrinsic evidence is admissible, together with such internal evidence as may be found in the document itself, to supply the necessary proof.

Thus, in Allen v. Maddock (f), an unattested will was held to have been incorporated in a duly executed codicil by the heading: "This is a codicil to my last will and testament," no other document having been found to answer to the reference (g). And where a document headed "Instructions for the will of J. Wood," disposed of the residue "in such manner as I shall direct by my will to be indorsed hereon," and the testator afterwards made a will, which, though not indorsed on the "instructions," was expressed to be made in "pursuance of the instructions for his will," no other instructions being found; it was held that the "instructions" in question were incorporated in the will (h). The evidence in the latter case was certainly slight. In University College of North Wales v. Taylor (i), the testator, shortly after executing a will, wrote out a document setting forth his wishes with reference to certain charitable bequests contained in his will; a few months afterwards he made a new will, in which he gave legacies to the same charitable institutions, to be held and applied "upon such terms and conditions and subject to such rules and regulations as are contained and specified in any memorandum amongst my papers written or signed by me relating thereto": it was held by the Court of Appeal that the document was not sufficiently identified to bring the case within the doctrine laid down in Allen v. Maddock.

Probate of unattested papers was refused in In bonis Garnett (j), and Eyre v. Eyre (k) for want of sufficient evidence to identify them. In Paton v. Ormerod (l), a recital in a will that the testatrix had settled certain property was held not to incorporate an old and revoked will by which she had dealt with that property, and evidence that she referred to some other settlement was not admitted.

Evidence required.

It is a circumstance frequently relied on that the document propounded for probate was shewn to some person before execution of the will, as the paper therein referred to (n).

An incorporated document may be revoked by destruction (o).

CHAPTER VI.

Probate of incorporated
documents,

—not necessary, to give jurisdiction to
Construction.

Although an incorporated document is entitled to probate—i.e., to be set out at length in the probate copy—there is no necessity for so proving it in order to bring it within the cognizance of the Court of Construction; for if it is not included in the probate copy, the Court will look at the original document. Thus, in Bizzey v. Flight (p), A. made a voluntary settlement which, as to certain bank shares and mortgages, was incomplete, so that the shares still belonged to A. at her death, and she by will “confirmed the settlement, dated, &c.”: the settlement was not included in the probate. Hall, V.-C., said: “If a will confirms an instrument which is sufficiently identified, and probate passes leaving in the clause containing the confirmation, the instrument must, I consider, be had regard to as if it were set out in the probate.” He held that the effect was as if the testatrix had declared “that the shares specified in the settlement should be held on the following trusts,” and had then set out the trusts. So in Quihampton v. Going (q), where a testator referred to certain entries he had made in his ledger, as explaining his will, Jessel, M.R., held that the ledger was incorporated in the will, and, though not admitted to probate, could be looked at by a Court of Construction, and that the entries therein were for the purposes of distribution of the estate conclusive—i.e., the M.R. treated them as part of the will, and not merely as evidence. These cases remove the doubt regarding the competence of the Court of Construction expressed by Dr. Lushington in Sheldon v. Sheldon (r).

Two wills.

The question what documents should be included in the probate copy often arises where a testator has made distinct wills, one of property in England, another of property abroad. Generally the

(p) 3 Ch. D. 269. The trusts that were invalid under the settlement being incorporated in and made part of the will, assumed the testamentary character in all respects, and became subject to ademption, &c.

(q) 24 W. R. 917. See also Singleton v. Tomlinson, 3 App. Ca. 404, where probate had been refused: but this was not relied on.

(r) 8 Jur. 877. But as the regular practice of the Court of Probate is to require every paper entitled to probate to be proved, and the original (In bonis Pewtner, 4 N. of C. 479), or if it cannot be procured, an authenticated copy (In bonis Dickens, 3 Curt. 60, In bonis Howden, 43 L. J. P. 26), to be deposited, it is inexpedient to declare trusts of personalty by reference to another instrument. And although where a paper is in the hands of strangers who refuse even to produce it (In bonis Battersbee, 2 Rob. 439; In bonis Sibthorp, L. R., 1 P. & D. 106) the rule is wholly dispensed with; and where the paper is of excessive length probate has been granted omitting the whole (In bonis Marquis of Lansdowne, 32 L. J. P. 121; In bonis Dundas, 32 L. J. P. 165; In bonis Balme, [1897] P. 261) or the immaterial parts (In bonis Countess of Limerick, 2 Rob. 313), showing that the question is one of convenience; yet it appears by the foregoing cases that special application is generally necessary to procure a relaxation of the rule.

former only need be proved here (s). But if one refers to or confirms the other in such a way as to incorporate it, both will be included in the probate (t).

If an incorporated document is very lengthy or cumbrous, the Court of Probate will sometimes allow it to be omitted from the probate copy, proper provision being made for its custody and production (u).

Omission of incorporated document from probate.

The cases where the Court enforces the execution of trusts not appearing on the face of the will or of any document incorporated in it, are considered in another chapter (v).

Undisclosed trusts.

Although a will which has been revoked by destruction cannot, strictly speaking, be revived by a subsequent codicil (w), practically the same effect can be produced by the doctrine of incorporation. Thus in In bonis Lindsay (x), a testator who had destroyed an early will made a codicil in which he referred to its provisions as contained in a draft of it which was before him, in such a way as to shew an intention to incorporate them in the codicil.

Effect of marriage alone under old law—in case of a woman ;

I.—By Marriage and Birth of Children, or Marriage alone, under the old Law.—Under the law which existed prior to the Act of 1 Vict. c. 26 (a), the marriage of a woman absolutely revoked her will (b), and that, too, though her testamentary capacity was subsequently restored by the event of her surviving her husband (c).

(a) For a full discussion of the old law as to revocation of wills, see the 4th Edition of this Work, Vol. I., pp. 122 et seq.

(b) It is hardly necessary to point out that in this chapter “will” is, as a general rule, used in the wide sense of “the aggregate contents” of all the testator’s testamentary dispositions, and therefore includes codicils (ante, p. 26, and see Evans v. Evans, 17 Sim. 108, post, p. 184). Where necessary, will and codicil are distinguished.

(c) Forse and Hembling’s Case, 4 Rep. 61, And. 181 ; Cotter v. Layer, 2 P. W.

But a will made by a woman before marriage, and operating as an appointment under a power, was not necessarily revoked by her marriage (d); nor was a will so operating and made during the coverture necessarily revoked by the death of the husband (e).

The marriage of a man, however, had no such revoking effect upon his previous testamentary dispositions, in regard to either real or personal estate, on the ground, probably, that the law had made for the wife a provision independently of the act of the husband, by means of dower; nor did the birth of a child alone revoke a will made after marriage, since a married testator must be supposed to contemplate such event; and the circumstance that the testator left his wife enceinte without knowing it, was held not to impart to the posthumous birth any revoking effect (f).

Marriage and the birth of a child conjointly, however, revoked a man's will, whether of real or personal estate; these circumstances producing such a total change in the testator's situation, as to lead to a presumption, that he could not intend a disposition of property previously made, to continue unchanged (g).

Old rule as to revocation by marriage and birth of children.

Marriage and the birth of issue did not, however, produce revocation of a will made before 1838, where there was a provision made for the wife and children by the will itself (h), or, it is conceived, by settlement executed previously to the will.

It seems, also, that marriage and the birth of a child or children revoked a will which was subject to the old doctrine, only where the effect of throwing open the property to the disposition of the law, would have been to let in such after-born child or children;

Will not revoked in favour of a pre-existing child.

But of course if the power be given to the wife "in case she dies in the lifetime of her husband," and in case of her surviving, the property is given to her absolutely, a will made during coverture is inoperative if the wife survives, as the power never arose, Price v. Parker, 16 Sim. 198; Trimmell v. Fell, 16 Beav. 537; Willock v. Noble, L. R., 7 H. L. 580; and will not even raise a case of election, Blaklock v. Grindle, L. R., 7 Eq. 215. See post, Chap. XXIII.

(f) Doe v. Barford, 4 M. & Sel. 10.

(g) This rule (which was borrowed from the civil law) was applied by the Ecclesiastical Courts to wills of personalty at an early period (see Overbury v. Overbury, 2 Show. 242; Lugg v. Lugg, 2 Salk. 592; Brown v. Thompson, 1 Eq. Ab. 413, pl. 15; Eyre v. Eyre, 1 P. W. 304, n.), and was more recently and reluctantly extended to devises of freehold estates, see Christopher v. Christopher, Dick. 445; Sprague v. Stone, Amb. 721; Parsons v. Lanoie, 1 Ves. sen. 192; Gibbons v. Caunt, 4 Ves. 848.

CHAPTER VII.

Privileged Wills.

Wills made since 1837 absolutely revoked by marriage under 1 Vict. c. 26.

Remarks upon the enactment.

Will in contemplation of marriage.

for, if it would have operated for the exclusive benefit of a pre-existing child, the ground for subverting the will failed (i).

These rules appear to apply to wills made by soldiers and seamen under the old law (ii).

II.—By Marriage, since the Wills Act.—No question of this nature can occur, under any will made since the year 1837, as the Act 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 18, has provided, “That every will made by a man or woman shall be revoked by his or her marriage (j) (except a will made in exercise of a power of appointment, when the real or personal estate thereby appointed would not, in default of such appointment, pass to his or her heir, customary heir, executor, or administrator, or the person entitled as his or her next of kin under the Statute of Distributions)”; and (s. 19) that “no will shall be revoked by any presumption of an intention on the ground of an alteration in circumstances.”

“1st, That, unless in the expressly excepted cases, marriage alone will produce absolute and complete revocation, as to both real and personal estate; and that no declaration, however explicit and earnest, of the testator’s wish that the will should continue in force after marriage, still less any inference of intention drawn from the contents of the will, and least of all evidence collected aliunde, will prevent the revocation (k).

“2nd, That merely the birth of a child, whether provided for by the will or not, will not revoke it; the legislature, while it invested with a revoking efficacy one of the several circumstances formerly requisite to produce revocation, having wholly disregarded the other.

“The new rule, though it may sometimes produce inconvenience, has at least the merit of simplicity, and will relieve this branch of testamentary law from the many perplexing distinctions, which grew out of the pre-existing doctrine.”

It was held, under the old law, that the revocation of a will by a subsequent marriage and birth of issue took place in consequence of a rule of law, independently of intention of the testator, and consequently that no evidence of intention was admissible (l). And it is clear that the same rule applies under the present law so as to revoke by a subsequent marriage a will expressly made in contemplation of such marriage.

CHAPTER VII.

The exception in the 18th section, of wills made in exercise of a power of appointment, where the property would not in default of appointment pass to the testator's heir, executor, &c., extends to the case of an appointment under a power, where the heirs executor or administrator, or statutory next of kin, would not take as such (m). Thus, where property was limited in default of appointment to the testator's children, who were his statutory next of kin, it was held that a will made by him in exercise of the power was not revoked by subsequent marriage (n). And as the words "next of kin" alone have a different meaning to "next of kin under the Statute of Distribution," a will under a power is not revoked by subsequent marriage where the gift in default of appointment is to the testator's "next of kin" (o). Where real estate is limited in default of appointment to the donee, his heirs or assigns, marriage will operate to revoke the will (p).

Exception as to testamentary appointments.

If a foreigner makes a will which is valid according to the law of his native country, and afterwards marries in accordance with the law of England, having at that time an English domicile, the marriage revokes the will (q). But it seems that sect. 18 of the Wills Act does not apply to the wills of foreigners domiciled abroad (r).

Will of foreigner.

III.—By Burning, Tearing, or Destroying.—The Statute of Frauds admitted of a will even of freehold estate, being revoked by burning, cancelling, tearing, or obliterating, by the testator himself, or in his presence and by his directions, and the transaction was not required to be attested by witnesses (s).

The act 1 Vict. c. 26, provides (s. 20) that a will or codicil may be revoked "by the burning, tearing or otherwise destroying the same by the testator or by some person in his presence and by his vocation by burning, &c., see the 4th edition of this work, Vol. I. pp. 129 et seq. The principal change is that under the Wills Act revocation by attempted cancellation or obliteration is not effectual unless executed in manner prescribed for the execution of a will. In other respects the decisions under the Statute of Frauds as to revocation of wills assist the construction of the Act 1 Vict. c. 26. Swinton v. Bailey, 4 App. Ca. 70, was a case of revocation by obliteration under the old law.

direction, with the intention of revoking the same." Revocation by obliteration forms the subject of a separate section (t).

Under the act 1 Vict. c. 26, it has been decided that the word "tearing" includes "cutting" (u); for it would be absurd to say that a will torn into two pieces was revoked, but that if cut into twenty pieces it was not revoked. The tearing or cutting, to be effectual, need not be of the whole will; tearing or cutting out that part of the will which may be said to be the principal part (v), or that part which gives effect to the whole, as the signature of the testator (w), or, probably, of the witnesses (x), will cause a revocation of the whole will, but the presumption of revocation thus arising may be rebutted (y). So also where the signatures of a testatrix and of the witnesses were scratched out as with a pen-knife, the will was held to have been effectually revoked (z). And where the will is written on several sheets, each signed and witnessed, tearing off the last signature will revoke the whole will, although the prior signatures are left (a). It has also been decided by the Court of Exchequer (b) that tearing off, animo revocandi, the seal of a will (though no seal is necessary to the due execution of a will) constituted a revocation. They said the instrument purported by the attestation clause to be executed under seal, and was published and attested as a sealed instrument, and when the seal was torn off it ceased to be the instrument which the testator purposed to execute and publish. And this authority was followed by Wood, V.-C., in a case (c) where a testator made his will on five sheets of paper, signed the first four, and signed and sealed the fifth, with an attestation clause describing the mode of execution;

In In bonis Simpson, supra, and in Magnesi (or Maynes) v. Hazelton, 44 L. T. 586, both pieces were preserved. See North v. North, 25 T. L. R. 322.

he afterwards tore off the signature from each of the first four sheets and struck through with his pen the signature on the last, and, the animus revocandi being proved in evidence, it was held that the will was revoked by the tearing (d). But in Clarke v. Scripps (e), where the testator had cut off his signature from the first six pages of his will, leaving his signature with the attestation clause and signatures of the witnesses, on the last sheet, it was held that the will was not revoked.

Cutting out a particular clause, or the name of a legatee, is a revocation pro tanto only (f). Revocation pro tanto.

The words "otherwise destroying" are to be taken to mean a destruction ejusdem generis with the modes before mentioned; that is, destruction, in the proper sense of the word, of the substance or contents of the will, or, at least, complete effacement of the writing, as by pasting over it a blank paper (g); and not a "destroying" in a secondary sense (h), as by cancelling or incomplete obliteration. Meaning of words "otherwise destroying."

Part of a will may be revoked by destruction. Thus, if a testator cuts out the name of a legatee or executor wherever it appears in the will, this is a good partial revocation, and the will is entitled to probate in its mutilated state (hh). Partial revocation.

In Re Coyte (i), the destruction of a document referred to in the will was held to be a revocation not only of the document itself, but also of the clause in the will referring to it.

Destruction by a person other than the testator, in order to operate as a revocation, must be both in the presence and by the direction of the testator (ii): and therefore a testator cannot revoke his will by authorizing any person to destroy it after his death (j): and if in such case the will should be destroyed its contents might be proved aliunde (k). Destruction by third person.

(a) Animus revocandi.—Revocation by destruction is in every case a question of intention, and accordingly evidence is admissible Evidence of animus admitted.

CHAPTER VII.

to show quo animo the act was done, which is a conclusion to be drawn by a court or jury from all the circumstances. The mere physical act of destruction is itself equivocal, and may be deprived of all revoking efficacy by explanatory evidence, indicating the animus revocandi to be wanting. Thus, if a testator destroys his will through inadvertence (l), or during a fit of insanity (m), or drunkenness (n), or tears it up under the mistaken impression that it is invalid (o), or useless (p), or that it has been already by other means effectually revoked (q), it will remain in full force, notwithstanding such accidental or involuntary or mistaken act. So, the destruction of the instrument by a third person in the lifetime, but without the permission or knowledge of the testator, would not affect its validity (r); à fortiori, if the destruction took place after his decease (s). Where a will is found torn after the death of the testator, and there is no direct evidence of intention, the question whether it was torn by him animus revocandi often depends on the appearance of the paper and other circumstances; the presumption seems to be that the tearing was done by him animus revocandi (t), but evidence is admissible to show that it is merely the effect of wear (u); for mere tearing or destruction, without intention to revoke, is no revocation, under the express terms of the act (v). Similarly, where a testator made a will which was revoked by his subsequent marriage but revived by a codicil made after the marriage, it was held that his destruction of the codicil did not

Where a testator becomes insane after the execution of his will, which is found to have been destroyed, the burden of proof that he destroyed it while he was of sound mind is cast on the person who sets up the revocation of the instrument: *Harris v. executed a codicil reviving his will, and containing provisions for the benefit of his wife, who predeceased him. On his death the codicil could not be found, and it was therefore presumed to have been destroyed by the testator under a mistaken belief that it was useless: the will and codicil were therefore admitted to probate. render the will inoperative, the Court being satisfied on the evidence that there was no intention to revoke the will, but that the testator had acted under a misconception as to the effect of his act (w).

So, if a will is destroyed with the intention of making a fair copy of it, this will not effect a revocation (x).

Where a testator destroys part of his will, the mere fact that what remains is thereby made incomplete or difficult to understand, does not shew that he intended to revoke the whole will (y); but where he destroys a substantial part of his will, intending to substitute other provisions, and the substitution is not effectually made, the question arises whether the remaining part of the will is revoked, on the principle that the testator only intended it to remain in force if the substituted provisions took effect. Thus in Treloar v. Lean (z), the testator destroyed three of the middle sheets of his will, and substituted three new ones, which were signed by him but not attested: the Court pronounced against the will with the consent of all parties. In Leonard v. Leonard (a) the testator destroyed the first two sheets of his will and substituted two others, each of which was signed by him and the persons who had witnessed the execution of the will, and the document as thus constituted was a complete testamentary disposition. It was held by Gorell Barnes, J., that the destruction of the two sheets operated as a revocation of the whole will, and that the interpolated sheets were not executed in accordance with the statute. The result was an intestacy. It may be observed that the learned judge's answer to the argument, that the new sheets constituted an "alteration" within the meaning of the Wills Act, is not quite conclusive: alteration and total destruction are two different things (b). It is also submitted that the cases of Clarke v. Scripps and In bonis Woodward, on which the learned judge relied, do not support the decision, and that it is inconsistent with the doctrine laid down by Butt, J., in Gardiner v. Courthope (bb).

Can there be revocation without animus?

Declarations made by the testator are admissible as evidence of his intention (c), those made at the time of the act of destruction being of course of greater weight than those made subsequently (d).

subsequently found to have been torn or mutilated, the burden of proving that the injury was done by the testator while of sound mind rests upon the party setting up revocation (e).

Effect where destruction is connected with a new disposition.

(b) Dependent relative Revocation.—Where the act of destruction is connected with the making of another will, so as fairly to raise the inference, that the testator meant the revocation of the old to depend upon the efficacy of the new disposition intended to be substituted, such will be the legal effect of the transaction; and therefore, if the will intended to be substituted is inoperative from defect of attestation, or any other cause, the revocation fails also, and the original will remains in force (f). In one case a testator, having some time before executed a will, duly attested, to each sheet of which he had affixed a seal, instructed his solicitor to prepare another, and signed the draft prepared from those instructions, and then proceeded to tear off the seals of the old will; after all the seals but one had been thus removed, he was informed, that the new will would not be operative upon his lands, in its then state, which induced him to desist; and before the new will was complete, the testator died: it was held, that the original will remained unrevoked (g).

Will destroyed to make new will.

A fortiori, where it appears from the evidence that the will is destroyed for the purpose of substituting a fresh will, the old will is not revoked, if the new one be in fact not made (h).

Intention to revive revoked will.

The same rule generally applies where the later of two inconsistent wills is destroyed on the supposition that the earlier will is thereby revived; for if this supposition be (as by the existing law we shall presently see it is) erroneous, the later will remains unrevoked. In this case the act of destruction is referable, not to any absolute intention to revoke, but to an intention to validate another paper; and as the assumption that the revocation will have that operation is erroneous, no true animus revocandi is considered to exist (i).

But the mere intention to make at some indefinite future time a new will, is not enough to prevent revocation (j). CHAPTER VII.

(c) Incomplete Destruction.—It has been seen that the act of destruction, without the intention to revoke, is ineffectual (k). Where, however, there is an intention on the part of the testator to destroy the will, but the act is not completed, the authorities present more matter for consideration (l). Revocation by partial destruction.

The early case of Bibb d. Mole v. Thomas (m) has generally been considered to establish that a very slight act of tearing is sufficient to effect a revocation, if done with such intention; the facts were as follows:—The testator (who had frequently declared himself dissatisfied with his will), being one day in bed near the fire, ordered W., a person who attended him, to fetch his will, which she did, and delivered it to him, it being then whole, only somewhat creased; he opened and looked at it, then gave it a rip with his hands, so as almost to tear a bit off, then rumbled it together, and threw it on the fire; but it fell off. However, it must soon have been burnt, had not W. taken it up, and put it into her pocket. The testator did not see her do so, but, afterwards, upon his repeated inquiries, she falsely told him that she had destroyed it. The testator afterwards told a person that he had destroyed his will, and should make no other until he had seen his brother, to whom he wrote to the same effect, and desired him to come down, saying, “If I die intestate, it will cause uneasiness.” The testator, however, died without making another will. The jury thought this a sufficient revocation, and the Court of C. P. was of the same opinion, on a motion for a new trial; De Grey, C. J., observing, that this case fell within two of the specific acts described by the Statute of Frauds; it was both a burning and a tearing; and that throwing it on the fire, with an intent to burn, though it was only very slightly singed and fell off, was sufficient within the statute.

It is not, however, to be inferred from this case, that the mere intention, or even attempt, of a testator to burn, tear, or destroy his will, is sufficient to produce revocation, within the meaning of the Statute of Frauds, or the Wills Act; for, the legislature having pointed out certain modes by which a will may be revoked, it is not in the power of the judicature, under any circumstances, to dispense with part of its requisitions, and accept the mere Mere attempt to destroy is not necessarily revocation.

intention or endeavour to perform the prescribed act, as a substitute or equivalent for the act itself, though the intention or endeavour may have been frustrated by the improper behaviour of a third person.

Thus, in the case of Doe d. Reed v. Harris (n), it appeared by the evidence of the testator's servant, that the testator had thrown the will on the fire, from which it was immediately snatched by a relative who lived with them, when the fire had merely singed the cover. The testator afterwards insisted upon her giving up the will to be burnt, which she promised to do; and, in order to satisfy the testator, threw something into the fire, which was not the will (as she represented it to be), of which the testator appears to have had some suspicion; for, upon the witness expressing her doubt whether the will had been destroyed, the testator said, "I do not care, I will go to L., if I am alive and well, and make another will." The Court of Q. B. held, that the will was not revoked, on the ground that there had been no actual burning of the instrument. "It is impossible," said Lord Denman, "to say that singeing a cover, is burning a will within the meaning of the statute." Patteson, J., said, "To hold that it was so, would be saying, that a strong intention to burn, was a burning. There must be, at all events, a partial burning of the instrument itself; I do not say that a quantity of words must be burnt; but there must be a burning of the paper on which the will is."

a testator suspends the destroying act before its completion.

It is also clear, that if a testator is arrested in his design of destroying the will, by the remonstrance or interference of a third person, or by his own voluntary change of purpose, and thus leaves unfinished the work of destruction which he had commenced, the will is unrevoked; and the degree in which the attempt had been accomplished, would not, it should seem, be very closely scrutinised, if the testator himself had put his own construction upon his somewhat equivocal act, by subsequently treating the will as undestroyed.

Thus, in Doe v. Perkes (o), where a testator, upon a sudden provocation by one of the devisees, tore his will asunder; and, after being appeased, fitted the pieces together, and expressed his satisfaction that it was no worse, and that no material injury had been done; it was held that the will remained unrevoked. Here (to use the language of a distinguished judge) (p) the intention of revoking was itself revoked, before the act was complete. And in Elms v. Elms (q), the testator had torn his will nearly through, but the evidence seemed to show that he intended to do more, and was stopped by the remonstrance of a person present, and it was held that the will was not revoked (r).

As to partial revocation by destruction, see above, p. 145.

(d) Destruction of Duplicate Will.—Sometimes a testator for greater security executes his will in duplicate, retaining one part and committing the other to the custody of another person (usually an executor or trustee); and questions have not unfrequently arisen as to the effect of his subsequently destroying one of such papers, leaving the duplicate entire. In these cases the presumption generally is, that the testator means by the destruction of one part to revoke the will, but the strength of the presumption depends much upon circumstances. Thus, where (s) he cancels that part which is in his own possession (the duplicate being in the custody of another), it is very strongly to be presumed, that he does not intend the duplicate to stand, he having destroyed all that was within his reach (t). So, if the testator have himself possession of both, the presumption of revocation holds, though weaker (u), and even if, having both in his possession, he alters one, and then destroys that which he had altered, there is also the presumption, but weaker still.

Effect of destroying one part of duplicate will.

These several gradations of presumption were stated by Lord Erskine in Pemberton v. Pemberton (v), the circumstances of which were as follows:—Two parts of a will were found in the possession of a testator at his death, the one cancelled, having various alterations in it, and the other not altered or cancelled; and the finding of the jury in three successive trials at law on these facts, and the evidence generally, was that the will was not revoked; and in that conclusion the L. C. finally concurred.

(q) 27 L. J. P. 96. And see In bonis Cockayne, 2 Jur. N. S. 454.

(r) "It occurs to remark," says Mr. Jarman, "that testators should be dissuaded from making or altering their wills (as they are often disposed to do), under the influence of any temporary excitement occasioned by the ill-conduct of a legatee; and, still more, from recording their resentment in their wills, which may have the effect of wounding the feelings of, and casting a stigma on, the offending party long after the transaction which gave occasion to the irritation has been effaced from recollection or is remembered only to be regretted."

The Probate Court will not readily omit from the probate any such record of displeasure: In bonis Honeywood, L. R., 2 P. & D. 251.

CHAPTER VII.

Perhaps, in such a case, the presumption can hardly be said to lean in favour of the revocation at all; for the testator having made alterations in one part, and then cancelled the part so altered only, the conclusion would rather seem to be, that he merely intended, by the destruction of that part, to get rid of the alterations, and to restore the will to its original state. And it is observable, that, in Roberts v. Round (w), where one of two duplicate wills was found partly mutilated, and the other carefully preserved, in the testator's own possession, it was held, that the will remained unrevoked.

The evidence in Pemberton v. Pemberton, as to the intent with which the act of cancellation was done, consisted partly of subsequent declarations of the testator, and these tended rather to favour the revocation than otherwise; but both Lord Eldon and Lord Erskine adverted to the very little weight due to expressions thrown out by testators in conversation with persons respecting their wills.

Declarations made by a testator after the date of his will are not admissible to prove that it was executed in duplicate (x).

Presumption
tion of wills.

(e) Lost Wills.—If a will is traced into the testator's possession, and is not found at his death, the presumption is that he destroyed it for the purpose of revoking it (xx); but the presumption may be rebutted, and it will be more or less strong according to the character of the custody which the testator had over the will (y). It is difficult to lay down any general rule as to the nature of the evidence which is required to rebut the presumption of destruction: it depends to a considerable extent on the testator's property and his relations towards his family. Where the will makes a careful and detailed disposition of the testator's property, and nothing happens to make it probable that he wishes to revoke it, the presumption raised by the disappearance of the will may be rebutted by slight evidence, especially if it is shown that access to the box, or other place of deposit where the will was kept, could be obtained by persons whose interest it is to defeat the will. In fact, it may almost be said that in such a case the presumption is the other way, namely, that the testator did not intend to die intestate (z). Declarations made by the testator are admissible, not as evidence as to the fact of destruction, but as evidence of intention either to revoke or to adhere to the will (a).

(xx) So if a will is written on several sheets, and only some of them are found after his death, it is generally to be presumed that he destroyed the others with the intention of revoking them: In bonis Gullan, 27 L. J. P. 15. Whether this revokes the whole will is another question: see ante, p. 144.

The ordinary presumption does not apply to the case of a testator who becomes insane after the execution of the will, and continues insane until his death: in such a case the burden of shewing that the will was destroyed while the testator was of sound mind lies on the party setting up the revocation (b).

Insanity.

If the will is traced out of the testator's custody, it is incumbent on the party setting up the revocation to prove that the will came again into the testator's custody, or was destroyed by his directions (c).

Custody of will.

In Flood v. Russell (d), there was no direct evidence of the execution of the alleged will, but the fact of its execution and its contents were proved by oral evidence.

What evidence is sufficient to prove execution of will.

(f) Secondary evidence of Contents of Lost or Destroyed Will.—Where a will has been lost or destroyed, and the presumption of destruction animo revocandi is rebutted, or does not arise, the contents of the will may be proved by secondary evidence: such as a draft or copy, or oral testimony (e); and it seems that the oral testimony of a single witness who takes an interest under the alleged will is sufficient (f). Declarations, written or oral, made by the testator before the execution of the will, are admissible as secondary evidence of its contents (g). In some cases post-testamentary declarations part of will. It was laid down in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards that it is not necessary that the whole of the contents of a lost or destroyed will should be proved, provided the Court is satisfied that the substantial parts have been proved. But the language of some of the judgments in that case goes beyond the principles laid down in other cases. For example, it seems clear that it is not sufficient to prove the residuary clause in the alleged will, at all events if there is reason to suppose that important legacies were also given by it (j).

Consent of persons interested. Where the property is small, the Court of Probate sometimes allows the contents of a lost will to be proved, without requiring the consent of all persons interested (k).

IV.—Whether a Codicil is revoked by Destruction of Will.—

Sometimes there is found, among the papers of a testator, a codicil without the will of which it professes to be part; in such cases the question arises, whether or not the destruction of the will (which it is to be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, was the act of the testator) operates, impliedly, to revoke the codicil also. This question, of course, depends mainly upon the contents of the several testamentary documents. If the dispositions in the codicil are so complicated with, and dependent upon, those of the will, as to be incapable of a separate and independent existence, the destruction of the will necessarily revokes the codicil (l); and before the Wills Act, the general presumption in the Ecclesiastical Courts was rather in favour of the intention to involve a codicil in the revocation of the will of which it was a part, where a contrary intention could not be collected either from the contents of the codicil itself or from extrinsic evidence (m). But if the codicil was capable, from the nature of its contents, of subsisting independently of the will, its validity was not affected by the destruction of the will (n).

Wills Act,
where will is destroyed but not the codicil.

The balance of authority seems to support the view that the statute 1 Vict. c. 26, has done away with the presumption, made by the old law, that the destruction of a will was an implied revocation of a codicil thereto (o). Lord Penzance repeatedly so held, on the ground that sect. 20, enacting that “no will or codicil shall be revoked otherwise than” by certain specified methods, plainly excludes the method in question (p). And these decisions were followed without dissent by Butt, J. (q). But in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards (r) a demurrer to a plea, dependent for its validity on this view of the statute, was formally (though without argument) overruled by Sir J. Hannen. Perhaps, however, the point is not of much importance. The presumption already stated was never a strong one, even under the old law, and the question whether the codicil was revoked or not always depended, and (supposing the presumption to continue) will still depend, mainly upon the contents of the codicil (s), and the effect of the evidence adduced to rebut the presumption (t).

It seems that if the will and codicil are written on the same piece of paper, and the testator cuts off the signature to the will, slight evidence is sufficient to shew that he meant also thereby to revoke the codicil (u).

The question whether the revocation of a will by a codicil, impliedly revokes an intermediate codicil, is referred to later (v).

V.—Obliterations, Interlineations, Cancellations, &c.—The Wills Act enacts (sect. 21) “that no obliteration, interlineation, or other alteration (w), made in any will after the execution thereof, shall be valid or have any effect, except so far as the words or effect of the will before such alteration shall not be apparent, unless such

P. 137. Whether under the old law the presumption existed with respect to codicils dealing with freehold land, appears never to have been decided. alteration shall be executed in like manner as hereinbefore is required for the execution of the will; but the will, with such alteration as part thereof, shall be deemed to be duly executed, if the signature of the testator and the subscription of the witnesses be made in the margin, or on some other part of the will opposite or near to such alteration, or at the foot, or end of, or opposite to a memorandum referring to such alteration, and written at the end or some other part of the will."

as to acts apparent and acts not appa-
face of a will.

With respect to a will executed before 1838, the question whether it is revoked or altered by any act apparent on the face of it, done on or after that date, as by erasure, obliteration or interlineation, must be determined by reference to the provisions of the Act 1 Vict. c. 26; but the question whether it is revoked by any act not apparent on the face of it, and done on or after that date, must be determined with reference to the law as it stood before the act (x).

Presumption
tion is made.

Where obliterations and interlineations appear on the face of a will, and there is no evidence to show when they were made, the presumption is that they were made after the execution of the will (y); but it seems that slight evidence is sufficient to rebut the presumption, unless the alterations are of an important character (z).

Incorporation
by codicil.

If there be a codicil to the will, and the codicil refers to unattested alterations in the will, this incorporates them in the codicil (a). If Whether those made afterwards are admissible does not seem to be settled: see cases cited above, p. 154. It is not enough that the alterations bear earlier date than the will: In bonis Adamson, L. R., 3 P. & D. 253. In Re Cruttenden, 30 W. R. 57, an interlineation affecting a devise of real estate was presumed to have been made before execution, on the ground that it had been included in the probate many years before.

the codicil takes no notice of them, the presumption is, that they were made after the date of the codicil (b). And the same presumptions hold regarding mutilation (c). But evidence is admissible to shew that the alterations in the will were made before the execution of the codicil, and this is generally sufficient to incorporate them (d), unless the circumstances shew that the testator did not treat them as effectual alterations (e).

Where a will has been drawn with blanks left for the names of the legatees and the amount of the legacies, or the like, which blanks are afterwards filled up, but there is no evidence to show when, the presumption is that the blanks were filled in before execution. And although there may have been no blanks, but the names of the legatees are found interlined, yet if the interlineation only supplies a blank in the sense, and appears to have been written with the same ink and at the same time as the rest of the will, the Court will conclude that it was written before execution (f). In Birch v. Birch (g), where some blanks were filled in with black ink and others with red, it was presumed that the additions in black ink were made before execution, but that those in red ink were made after execution, the envelope in which the will was found appearing to have been sealed, opened and re-sealed.

Where alterations are necessary to supply blanks; or to make sense.

Pencil alterations made before execution, if the body of the will is in ink, are generally disregarded, being primâ facie merely deliberative (h). But if a blank is filled up in pencil before execution, the matter so inserted will be included in the probate (i). And if a clause which is inconsistent with the rest of the will is struck out in pencil, it may be treated as cancelled (j).

CHAPTER VII. from the appearance of the document, that all the alterations had been made before execution (k).

Alterations made after execution.

Alterations may be made after the execution of the will, and are effectual under sect. 21 of the Wills Act (l), if properly identified by the signature of the testator and two witnesses. Thus interlineations made in a will after execution, opposite which the testator and the two original attesting witnesses have written their names in the margin, will be included in the probate (m). But the signature of the witnesses alone is not sufficient, unless the will is re-executed (n). And where a testator made some alterations in his will, and he and the attesting witnesses traced over their former signatures with a dry pen, and the witnesses put their initials in the margin opposite to the several alterations, it was held that the alterations were not duly executed (o).

Where new sheets are interpolated.

In Leonard v. Leonard (p), the testator executed a will written on five sheets; he afterwards destroyed the first two sheets and substituted two others, each of which was signed by him and by the two witnesses who attested the original will. It was held by Gorell Barnes, J., that the two new sheets could not be considered as "alterations" within the meaning of sect. 21 of the Wills Act.

Memorandum as to alterations.

Where two alterations are made in a will after execution, and at the end of the will there is written a memorandum (duly executed and attested) referring expressly to only one of the alterations, it may be inferred from the nature of the alterations that both were intended to be referred to (q).

Confirmation by codicil.

As already mentioned, where a testator alters his will by unattested alterations, and afterwards makes a codicil to it, this confirms the alterations (r), unless it appears from the codicil or otherwise that the alterations were merely deliberative (s).

will of personalty without formality (t), the question often arose whether alterations made in pencil were final or merely deliberative, the presumption being that they were not intended as final (u). The question can still arise where an altered will is confirmed by a codicil, and the presumption is the same as under the old law (v). But the presumption is not always acted on (w).

In Oldroyd v. Harvey (x), a testator duly executed a will and codicil; he afterwards added some words to the codicil, and proceeded to write, on the same piece of paper, below the codicil, some further dispositions commencing thus: "I, the within named H. L., hereby declare this to be a codicil to my within-written will (y). I revoke, &c." This second codicil was duly executed and attested. The second codicil and the addition to the first codicil were written by the testator at one sitting. It was held that the addition to the first codicil formed part of the second codicil and must be admitted to probate.

The doctrine of dependent relative revocation applies to partial revocation by obliteration or cancellation (z). Thus, if a testator bequeaths "to A. B. a legacy of one hundred pounds," and erases the amount, leaving words of bequest and the name of the legatee, this is taken to shew an intention to substitute some other amount, and that intention having failed, the amount of the original bequest can be supplied by parol evidence (a). So if a testator erases the amount and writes some other amount over it (b). But if the bequest is "to A. B., one hundred and fifty pounds," and the testator erases the words "one hundred and," without substituting any other amount, it is inferred that the testator's intention was simply to revoke the bequest pro tanto, and the bequest of the one hundred pounds being illegible, the legacy stands at fifty pounds (c).

obliteration (unless attested in manner required by the act, or confirmed by a codicil, or unless it prevents the words, as originally written, from being apparent), can operate as a revocation of a testamentary disposition, however clearly the testator may have expressed his intention (d). In some cases the name of a legatee, which has been completely obliterated by the testator, has been supplied by inference from the context (e). Even if the testator partially erases his own signature and those of the attesting witnesses, this is no revocation (f). Glasses (g), and special arrangements of light (h), have been used for discovering what the words obliterated originally were; but parol evidence is inadmissible (i), except in those cases where the obliteration was made for the purpose merely of altering the amount of the gift and not of revoking it; in which case, there being no intention to revoke except for the purpose of substituting a gift of a different amount, if the latter cannot take place by reason of the substituted words not being properly attested, the former gift will now (as under the Statute of Frauds) remain good, and evidence must be admitted to show what the original words were (j). The same rule applies, where the necessary evidence is forthcoming, to an erasure of the name of a legatee (k); and to an erasure of the name of an executor (l).

Obliteration by pasting paper over words

Where the obliteration has been effected by pasting a piece of paper over a complete clause in the will, the Court will not order it to be removed, but will endeavour to ascertain what the words of the clause are; if this can be done they are "apparent" within the meaning of the section (m). But where the testator has only covered up the amount of the legacy, leaving the legatee's name untouched, the Court will consider it a case of dependent relative revocation, and will endeavour to discover the amount of the legacy originally bequeathed by removing the piece of paper (n). And it seems that where the testator has written words on the back of a testamentary paper and afterwards pasted a piece of paper over them, the Court can direct the removal of it in order to ascertain whether the words amount to a revocation (o). CHAPTER VII.

Striking a pen through the gift to a legatee, though not now a sufficient revocation of a legacy, and not to be noticed in the probate, may nevertheless not be altogether without use; for where the testator has paid a sum in his lifetime to the legatee, it seems that the fact of the gift being struck out in the original will, would be received as evidence that the payment was intended to be in satisfaction of the legacy (p); and the Court of Probate has sometimes granted fac-simile probate of a will, shewing interlineations, or parts of the will struck through (q). Satisfaction proved by obliteration.

VI.—Revocation by Alteration of Estate under old Law.—Under the old law. “Under the old law, it was essential to the validity of a devise of freehold lands, that the testator should be seised thereof at the making of the will, and that he should continue so seised without interruption until his decease (r). If, therefore, a testator, subsequently to his will, by deed aliened lands, which he had disposed of by such will, and afterwards acquired a new freehold estate in the same lands, such newly-acquired estate did not pass by the devise, which was necessarily void” (s). And a devise of land which the testator had contracted to purchase was revoked by his afterwards having it conveyed to him to uses to bar dower (t).

As equity follows the law, the same general principles which governed the revocation of devises of legal estates, were held to apply to devises of equitable interests. The devise of such an interest, therefore, was liable to be revoked by a conveyance similar to that which would have revoked a devise at law (u).

CHAPTER VII.

VII.—Revocation by Alteration of Estate under present Law.—

Devises not to be revoked as to testator's disposable interest at decease, by conveyance or like act.

The revocation of devises by an alteration of estate was placed on an entirely new footing by the statute 1 Vict. c. 26, which provides (sect. 23), that no conveyance or other act made or done subsequently to the execution of a will of or relating to any real or personal estate therein comprised, except an act by which such will shall be revoked as aforesaid, shall prevent the operation of the will with respect to such estate or interest in such real or personal estate, as the testator shall have power to dispose of by will at the time of his death (v).

Sale or conveyance of devised land.

In regard to wills which are within this section, a subsequent conveyance of the devised property will not produce revocation, except so far as it substantially alienates the estate, and withdraws it from the operation of the devise by vesting the property in another. If a testator, after devising an estate, sells and conveys it to a third person, of course the devise is still (as formerly) rendered inoperative, and the devisee can have no claim to the proceeds of the sale, even though the will should have directed the conversion of the property, and the proceeds can be traced into an investment (w). If the testator sells a specifically devised piece of land, and afterwards buys another piece of land answering the same description, the question whether that passes by the devise is governed, not by sect. 23, but by sect. 24, the effect of which is considered in Chapter XII.

Devise is revoked by contract to sell.

Where the testator contracts to sell the devised estate, and dies without having executed a conveyance to the purchaser, the devise remains in force as to the legal estate and no further, this being all

431; Vawser v. Jeffrey, 16 Ves. 519, 2 Sw. 268; Briggs v. Watt, 2 Jur. N. S. 1041; Walker v. Armstrong, 21 Beav. 284, 8 D. M. & G. 531; Power v. Power, 9 Ir. Ch. Rep. 178. The rule stated in the text admitted of two exceptions:—1st, both at law and in equity, in the case of a partition merely assuring to the testator an estate in severalty corresponding to his former undivided share, Luther v. Kirby, 3 P. W. 169, n., 8 Vin. Ab. 148, pl. 30; Risley v. Balinglass, T. Raym. 240; Webb v. Temple, 1 Freem. 542; Barton v. Croxall, Tam. 164. But the manner of partition might cause revocation, see Knollys v. Alcock, 5 Ves. 648, 7 ib. 558; cf. Phillips v. Turner, 17 Beav. 194. In Grant v. Bridger, L. R., 3 Eq. 347, it was attempted to bring within these authorities a case where commoners, after devise, joined with the owners of the soil in conveying the land to trustees, and took back shares of the land in severalty, but, of course, unsuccessfully. 2ndly, in equity, a will was only partially revoked by a subsequent mortgage of the devised land, Hall v. Dench, 1 Vern. 329, 342, but see 2 Ch. Rep. 54; Perkins v. Walker, 1 Vern. 97. See further as to revocation of wills by alteration of estate under the old law, the 4th edition of this work, Vol. I. pp. 147 et seq.

(v) As to the meaning of the section, see Blake v. Blake, 15 Ch. D. at p. 487.

the interest which the testator has power to dispose of at his decease, and the conversion, as between the real and personal representatives, being completely effected, and the estate of the vendor being in contemplation of equity, "disposed of" by the contract (supposing it to be a binding one (x),) the devisee takes only the legal estate (y), and the purchase-money constitutes part of the testator's personal estate (z).

A devise is also, as a general rule, revoked or adeemed if the land is converted, during the testator's lifetime, by some person other than the testator, or by operation of law; as, by act of parliament (a), or by an order for sale pronounced by a Court of competent jurisdiction (b), or by compulsory sale under the Lands Clauses Acts, or similar acts (c), or by sale under a power given by the testator to a mortgagee (d). And although the converting effect of a sale under an act of parliament or under an order of Court is neutralised, if the statute (e) or order (f) directs a re-investment in land to be settled to the same uses, yet it seems clear that this would not cause the will to operate on the substituted land (g). For the same principle seems to apply as that which governs the case of land being appointed under a power, and afterwards sold under a power of sale containing a direction for re-investment in land (h).

Effect of compulsory conversion.

A sale by the Court in lunacy formerly operated as a conversion for all purposes (i), but this rule was altered by the Lunacy

An unauthorised sale by a third person would not, it is conceived, defeat the claim of the devisee to the proceeds of sale. See Taylor v. Taylor, 10 Hare, 478, 479; Re Tugwell, 27 Ch. D. 309.

- CHAPTER VII. Regulation Act 1853, sect. 119 of which enacted that the surplus proceeds of sale of the land of a lunatic should belong to his heirs, devisees, &c., in the same way as the land would have devolved if it had not been sold (j). And a similar, but somewhat wider, provision is contained in the Lunacy Act, 1890 (k).
- Purchase of land in lunacy. If the money of a lunatic is invested by his committee by order of the Court, in the purchase of land, and the land is conveyed to the committee subject to a declaration that it shall be considered as part of the lunatic's personal estate, and the lunatic dies before 1894, probate duty is payable on the value of the land (l).
- Settlement. It is hardly necessary to say that a conveyance by way of settlement revokes a devise of the same property (m).
- Personalty. Where personal property is specifically bequeathed and afterwards sold, the effect is generally to adeem the bequest (n). And a valid contract of sale will have the same effect (o). But an unauthorised sale of personal property (as by persons assuming to act for an insane person), does not affect the rights of legatees (p). A sale of personal property of a lunatic by order of the Court adeems a specific bequest of it if the proceedings are taken under the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853 (q), but not, it seems, if they are taken under the Act of 1890, and the proceeds of sale can be identified (r).
- Surrender of lease. Where a testator disposes of a house which he holds on lease, and afterwards surrenders it and acquires another lease of the same house, the question whether the dispositions of the will apply to the new lease seems to be one of construction. In Wedgwood v. Denton (s), the question was answered by Bacon, V.-C., in the affirmative, although there the duration of the trusts declared by the will depended on the term of the original lease, which was different from that of the new lease.
- Bequest of term how affected by purchase of the fee. How a specific bequest of leaseholds is affected, under sect. 23 of the Wills Act, by the subsequent acquisition of the fee, was considered in Cox v. Bennett (t), where a testator having bequeathed

 (t) L. R., 6 Eq. 422. See also Struthers v. Struthers, 5 W. R. 809. Both these cases appear to require the further support of s. 3, which enables a testator to dispose of all real estate to which he may be entitled at the time of his death, and of s. 24, which enacts that every will shall be construed with "his houses at T., held on lease from B.," to X., and the residue of his real and personal estate to Y., afterwards purchased and took a conveyance to himself of the reversion in fee. It was held by Sir G. Giffard, V.-C., that the entire interest in the houses passed by the specific gift to X. He said, "the clause in the statute (i.e. sect. 23) says that the will is to pass such estate or interest in such real or personal estate as the testator shall have power to dispose of at his death; and there is nothing in the will to confine its operation to the interest which the testator had at the date of the will." This question is further considered in Chapter XII.

"A revocation by alienation," as Mr. Jarman points out (tt), "may be either partial or total. A simple case of partial revocation occurs where a testator, having devised lands in fee, demises the same lands to a lessee for lives or for years, either at a rent or not, in which case the lease revokes or subverts the devise pro tanto, by subtracting or withdrawing the demised interest from its operation (u), but the devise is no further disturbed; and, consequently, the devisee would, even under the old law, still take the inheritance, subject to the term, and, as incidental thereto, the rent, if any, reserved by the lease (v). So, if a testator, after devising lands in fee, conveys them by deed to the use of himself for life, with remainder to the use of his wife for life, as a jointure, without disposing of or in any manner assuming to convey the inheritance, the conveyance would revoke the devise pro tanto, and the reversion in fee, expectant on the decease of the testator's wife, would pass under it to the devisee. In both the preceding examples, it will be perceived, that the conveyance is not only partial in its object, but in its operation; it does not for a moment disturb the testator's seisin of the inheritance, and, therefore, can have no revoking effect, beyond the estate which it substantially alienates and vests in another person. Consistently with this principle, it is clear, that (w) where a testator by his will charges reference to the real and personal estate comprised in it to take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the testator's death: for s. 23 says only that no subsequent act shall prevent the will operating, implying that but for the subsequent act the will would have operated on the interest in question; which it would not have done without the aid of ss. 3, 24. his lands with an annuity, and afterwards demises them for a term of years at rack rent, the devise is revoked so far as to deprive the devisee of his legal power of distress, while the tenancy lasts (x), but no further; and the annuitant would be entitled in equity, during the suspension of his power of distress, to have the rent, or an adequate portion of it, applied in satisfaction of the annuity."

VIII.—By void Conveyances under old Law.—Under the old law, an instrument purporting to be a conveyance, but incapable of taking effect as such, might, nevertheless, operate to revoke a previous devise, on the principle, as it should seem, that the attempted act of conveyance was inconsistent with the testamentary disposition, and, therefore, though ineffectual to vest the property in the alienee, it produced a revocation of the devise. The rule obtained wherever the failure of the conveyance arose either from the incapacity of the grantee, or from the want of some ceremony which was essential to the efficacy of the instrument (y).

Rule as to wills since 1837.

A question of this nature, however, cannot arise in regard to wills made since 1837, for as, under the Wills Act, even an actual conveyance does not produce revocation, except so far as it may, by alienating the testator's interest, leave the devise nothing to operate upon, it is obvious that a void or attempted conveyance cannot, under any circumstances, have, as such, a revoking effect (z).

Old law.

IX.—Express Revocation by a subsequent Will, Codicil or Writing.—Under the old law, a devise of freehold land could not be revoked by a subsequent will or codicil, unless the latter was signed in the presence of three witnesses, while a will of personal estate could be revoked by an informal writing, not signed by the testator (a).

Question how affected by Wills Act.

In regard to wills made since the year 1837, however, it can never be a question, whether an informal or apparently unfinished will or writing has a revoking operation, for the statute 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 20, has placed a revoking will or writing (b) upon precisely the same footing, in regard to the ceremonial of execution, as a disposing will; and when that ceremonial has been observed, it can never be said that the will is informal or unfinished.

A will or codicil may operate as a revocation of a prior testamentary instrument, by the effect either of an express clause of revocation, or of an inconsistent disposition of the previously devised property (c).

Express revocation may, it seems, be produced in two different modes, having different effects. Thus, if there be a bequest by will to several persons as tenants in common, and by codicil the testator revoke the bequest to one of them, his share, as a general rule (d), will not accrue to the others (e). This is the ordinary mode. But if the testator revoke "so much of my will" as contains the gift to one of such persons, here, if the words that remain are sensible per se, and amount without further alteration to a gift of the whole subject to the others, these will take the whole, the will being read as if the revoked words had never been in it. Harris v. Davis (f), affords an example of the latter mode. In that case there was first a gift to A. and B. in common; then, in a subsequent part of the will a direction that C. should take a share with A. and B.; and afterwards a codicil revoking "that part written in my will which leaves" the share to C.: and it was held that A. and B. took the whole. The frame of the will was peculiar, and lent itself easily to this construction. If the words that are left require (as they generally would) some further alteration or addition to make them sensible, the construction will not be made (g).

Distinction between revocation of a gift and of so much of will as contains the gift.

If a codicil expressly revokes part of a will, its operation is not,

(b) The writing must "declare an intention to revoke," but need not be testamentary. And unless testamentary it will not be admitted to probate: In bonis Fraser, L. R., 2 P. & D. 40; In bonis Eyre, [1905] 2 Ir. R. 540; Toomer v. Sobinska, [1907] P. 106. See also In b. Hicks, L. R., 1 P. & D. 683; In b. Durance, L. R., 2 P. & D. 406. (c) A revocation by reference is, of course, equivalent to an express revocation. The question arose in Re Cour- tauld's Estate, [1882] W. N. 185: it was held that there was no revocation, but a substitution.

it seems, restrained by a recital in the codicil shewing that the testator did not intend the revocation to be absolute (h).

In order that an express clause of revocation may be effectual, it must indicate an actual and present intention to revoke the will; and if the testator's expressions are declaratory only of a future design, they will not be sufficient (i); and in an early case, before the Statute of Frauds, a distinction is taken between the effect of a testator saying "I will revoke my will made at P.," which refers to a future act, and when he says "my will made at P. shall not stand," which is a present resolution, the latter being, it was considered, an actual revocation, and the former not (j).

tion to revoke by a future act inoperative.

Of course, a mere intimation by a testator of his intention to make by a future act a new disposition, does not effect an actual present revocation. Thus, where A. (k) made a will, disposing of his real and personal property, and afterwards, the residuary legatee of the personalty being dead, and A. having acquired other real property, he made another will whereby he devised the newly-acquired property, and then wrote as follows:—"As to the rest of my real and personal estate I intend to dispose of the same by a codicil to this my will hereafter to be made:" it was held that this clause was not a revocation of the prior will. But the operation of an express revocation of a will is not affected by the testator adding that he intends to make a new will (l).

Express
revocation
construction.

And even an express clause of absolute and present revocation of all former wills may be reduced to total or partial silence, by showing that the clause was inserted by mistake (m). There are also decisions to the effect that a clause of revocation will be disregarded where it is unreasonable to give unrestrained effect to the words; as in cases where, by one testamentary paper, a person exercises a power of appointment, and then by subsequent instruments containing a general clause of revocation, either exercises another and distinct power (n), or deals with his own property, and not with the subject of the former power (nn). But these decisions are now of doubtful authority (o). And even before the modern doctrine was established, the rule supposed to be laid down in the earlier cases was not applied, if the testator in the latter will again referred to the power exercised by the former will (oo).

If a testator makes a will and one or more codicils, and then makes a codicil revoking the will, this does not necessarily revoke the intermediate codicils: the question is whether the testator distinguishes between the will and the codicils (p).

Intermediate
codicils.

Questions of dependent relative revocation arise most commonly in cases where a will is destroyed or revoked by some physical act (pp), and although the question can arise where a will purports to be revoked by a subsequent testamentary instrument, it would seem that there is greater difficulty in applying the general principle to such cases, because revocation by a written instrument is more deliberate and unambiguous than revocation by destruction.

Dependent
revocation.

Mr. Jarman states the law thus (q): "Though the Statute of Frauds required that a will which revoked a devise of freehold lands should be attested by the same number of witnesses, as a will devising such lands, yet, in some particulars, the prescribed ceremonial differed in the respective instances. Thus, a devising will was required to be subscribed by the witnesses in the testator's presence, which a revoking will was not, and a revoking will was required to be signed by the testator in the presence of the witnesses, while a devising will needed not to be signed in their presence; each therefore had a circumstance not common to both. This difference, however (which probably occurred without design), has been attended with little practical effect, for it seldom happens that a testamentary instrument is executed for the mere purpose of revoking a previous will, and if it contain a new disposition, any revoking clause therein will be a nullity, whether the substituted devise takes effect or not, though for widely different reasons in the respective cases. If the devise with which the clause in question is associated be effective, it reduces the latter to silence by rendering it unnecessary, the new devise itself producing the revocation, so that the efficacy of the will as a revoking instrument cannot, in such a case, become a subject of consideration. If, on the other hand, the new devise be ineffectual, on account of the attestation being insufficient for a devising, though sufficient for a revoking will, the revoking clause becomes inoperative on another principle, namely, that the revocation is conditional and dependent on the efficacy of the attempted new disposition, and that failing, the revocation also fails; the purpose to revoke being considered to be, not a distinct independent intention, but subservient to the purpose of making a new disposition of the property; the testator meaning to do the one so far only as he succeeds in effecting the same (qq). But it seems that, if the second devise fails, not from the infirmity of the instrument, but from the incapacity of the devisee, the prior devise is revoked" (r).

The second rule stated by Mr. Jarman is frequently acted on at the present day. Thus in Tupper v. Tupper (rr), the testator by his will bequeathed valid legacies to various persons: by a codicil he revoked them, "and in lieu thereof" bequeathed a legacy which failed under the Mortmain Acts: it was held that the revocation took effect.

taken by Mr.
Jarman is sound.

The cases of Eggleston (or Eccleston) v. Speke and Onions v. Tyrer (s), which Mr. Jarman cites in support of the first rule stated by him, could not now occur, because, since the Wills Act, a will which is valid for purposes of revocation, is also valid, so far as execution goes, for purposes of disposition. But it is still possible for a case to occur in which the second or substituted gift fails "from the infirmity of the instrument," so as to bring the case within the rule laid down by Mr. Jarman, though the tendency of the Courts seems to be to treat every express revocation as effective, unless it is made conditional on the substituted gift taking effect.

Thus in In bonis Gentry (t), a testator executed a testamentary document in which he expressed a desire to cancel a will made in 1866, "and that the will that I made on the 17th of October, 1855, with the codicil dated February 21st, 1871, should stand as my last will and testament." The instrument of 17th October, 1855, was not a will, but a settlement, which only included certain property then belonging to the testator; it was held that the revocation of the will of 1866 was absolute. Sir James Hannen said it seemed to him "in the highest degree unnatural" that the testator intended the revocation of the will of 1866 to be contingent on the settlement operating as a will, and he held that the revocation was absolute. But it is submitted that the application of the doctrine of dependent relative revocation, in cases where the testator wishes to give effect to a prior testamentary disposition, is not based on the supposition that the revocation is conditional: it depends on mistake (tt). In In bonis Gentry the testator erroneously supposed that the settlement was testamentary in character; this was shewn by his describing it as "the will" that he had made; in other words, he supposed that it would operate on all the property belonging to him at his death, and under this mistaken belief he revoked the will of 1866; the revocation was therefore, it is submitted, inoperative, under the doctrine laid down by Mr. Jarman.

Notwithstanding the general rule, that the revocation of a gift to one of several tenants in common does not enure for the benefit of the others, it may do so if that is the testator's intention. Thus in Re Radcliffe (u), the testatrix left her residuary estate to A. B. C. and D. as tenants in common; D. predeceased the testatrix; by a codicil referring to his death she revoked whatever interest D. had in her will: it was held that this took the name of D. out of the will, and that A., B. and C. took the whole residue.

In Cottrell v. Cottrell (v), a testator made a will in England disposing of all his property, real and personal; fifteen years later, being then domiciled in Italy, he made a will there by which he disposed of his personal property, and declared that he revoked every other will which he might have made: it was held that this revoked the English will so far only as related to the personalty and the appointment of executor.

Revocation general in terms may be partial in effect.

An attestation clause is no part of a codicil, and consequently if words purporting to revoke an earlier testamentary instrument are inserted in the attestation clause of a codicil, they have no revoking effect (w).

"Last" or

X.—Implied Revocation by inconsistent Will or Codicil (x)—

The mere fact of making a subsequent testamentary paper does not work a total revocation of a prior one, unless the latter expressly or in effect revoke the former, or the two be incapable of standing together; for though it be a maxim that no man can die with two testaments, yet any number of instruments, whatever be their relative date, or in whatever form they may be (so as they be all clearly testamentary) may be admitted to probate as together containing the last will of the deceased. And if a subsequent testamentary paper be partially inconsistent with one of an earlier date, then such latter instrument will revoke the former as to those parts only where they are inconsistent (z).

Accordingly, where a testator made a will in 1823, and a few years later made another will, not referring to the former, and not containing any clause of revocation, both wills were admitted to probate, the two documents being only partially inconsistent (a). On the other hand, even if the earlier will disposes of all the testator's property, and the later will does not contain a clause of revocation or any residuary gift, it may appear from a comparison of the two documents that the later was intended to revoke the earlier (b). But on the whole it seems that there is a presumption against revocation by equivocal words (c).

It follows from the general principle above stated, that if a testator makes two wills, and the later one is lost or destroyed, and there is no evidence to shew that it expressly or impliedly revoked the earlier will, the earlier will is entitled to probate (d).

If the second will is lost or destroyed, parol evidence is admissible to prove its contents (e).

An instrument stating itself to be the testator's "last will," or his "last and only will" (f), does not necessarily operate to revoke

(x) It is hardly necessary to point out that the term "revocation" is not strictly applicable where mutually inconsistent provisions are found in the same testamentary instrument. This subject is considered in Chap. XVII.

(z) This statement of the law, which is taken from Williams on Executors, 7th ed. i. 162, has been judicially approved: Lemage v. Goodban, L. R., 1 P. & D. 57; In bonis Petchell, L. a prior will, as regards either real (g) or personal (h) estate (i), although the circumstance is one to be considered (j). CHAPTER VII.

If a testator makes two codicils to his will, and then makes a third by which he confirms his will and the first codicil, without referring to the second, this does not necessarily operate as a revocation of the second codicil (k).

“The most simple and obvious case of revocation by inconsistency of disposition,” as Mr. Jarman points out (l), “is that of a testator having devised lands to a person in fee, and then, by a subsequent will, devising the same lands to another in fee; in such case the latter devise would operate as a complete revocation or the former (m). And here, the learned reader cannot fail to perceive in the difference of construction which has obtained, where two devises in fee of the same land are found in one and the same will, and where they are found in several distinct wills, the greater anxiety evinced to reconcile the several parts of the same testamentary paper, than to reconcile several distinct papers of different dates, though constituting, in the whole, one will. In the former case, the devisees (as hereafter shewn) take concurrently in order to avoid making one part of the will contradict and subvert another; and in the latter case, no hesitation seems to have been felt in holding the second devise to be revocatory of the first. And the distinction seems to be reasonable; for though it may be very unlikely that a testator should wholly change the object of the devise in the short interval between his passing from one part of the will to the other, there is no such improbability, that, in the longer lapse of time between the execution of two testamentary papers of different dates, such a change of purpose should have occurred.”

So if the residue of personal estate be given by will to A., and by codicil to B., the former gift is revoked (n). And this was so held in Earl of Hardwicke v. Douglas (o), though the gift by codicil was of personal estate "not hereinbefore or by my will or any other codicil disposed of." The words were construed to mean "not hereinbefore or by my will disposed of by way of particular legacies," thus leaving something for the gift to operate upon: literally construed they left nothing. Again, in Kermode v. Macdonald (p), a testatrix by her will bequeathed specific and pecuniary legacies, and directed that in case her personal estate proved insufficient for the payment of the legacies, the deficiency should be made up out of her real estate, and gave the residue of her personal estate to A.; by a codicil she gave "all my personal estate" to B.; it was held, that "all my personal estate" meant the whole of the personal estate which by her will the testatrix had divided into two portions, the legacies and the residue, and that the specific legacies were therefore wholly revoked, but that the charge of the pecuniary legacies on the real estate was not revoked, and that they were payable out of it accordingly.

A testamentary instrument may be impliedly revoked by a later one which is substantially or in great part a repetition of it (q).

Legacy to executor.

If a testator appoints A. his executor, and bequeaths him a legacy on condition that he proves the will, and by codicil revokes the appointment of A. as executor, this carries with it the revocation of the legacy (r). But this result would not follow if the legacy were given to A. independently of the office of executor (s).

Gift of particular residue not revoked by codicil giving the general residue.

But where a testator bequeathed portions of "his money in the funds" to several legatees, and "the surplus of his money in the funds" to be distributed by his executors among the legatees, and then by codicil, after bequeathing some specific chattels, gave "the surplus remaining after the aforesaid legacies are paid" to the children of A.; Sir J. K. Bruce, V.-C., held that the gift of surplus money in the funds was not revoked by the residuary gift contained in the codicil, which was so expressed as to embrace other property (t).

every other kind of evidence, it is impossible to ascertain the relative chronological position of two conflicting wills, both are necessarily held to be void, and the heir as to the realty, and the next of kin as to the personalty, are let in ; but this unsatisfactory expedient is never resorted to until all attempts to educe from the several papers a scheme of disposition consistent with both, have been tried in vain (v). And even where the times of the actual execution of the respective papers are known, so that if they are inconsistent, there can be no difficulty in determining which is to be preferred, the Courts will, if possible, adopt such a construction as will give effect to both, sacrificing the earlier so far only as it is clearly irreconcilable with the latter paper (w) ; supposing, of course, that such latter paper contains no express clause of revocation.

Inconsistent wills always to be reconciled if possible,

“ As where a testator made a will devising his lands to trustees, for two hundred years, to pay his debts, and afterwards, by another will, devised the same lands to other trustees for three hundred years, to discharge some particular specialty debts mentioned in a deed executed after the first will, and all incumbrances affecting the property ; Lord Talbot held, that the first term of two hundred years was not revoked, as the two terms were not inconsistent, the testator’s intention in creating the term of three hundred years being merely for the purpose of giving priority in payment to the specialty debts, and the charges affecting the estate (x).

“ The inclination to such a construction as would preserve, either wholly or in part, the contents of the prior document, however, exists only, either when the subsequent document is inadequate to the disposition of the entire property, so that the consequence of rejecting the prior document would be to produce partial intestacy (y) ; or else where the posterior paper is styled a codicil (z) ; for the office of a codicil being to vary or add to and not wholly supplant a previous will, such a designation of the instrument CHAPTER VII. seems to demand that some part, at least, of the will, whose existence it supposes and recognises, should, if possible, be sustained."

Where it is not.

If the subsequent instrument does not profess to be a codicil, and is adequate to the disposition of the entire property, there is no such à priori improbability that it was intended wholly to supplant the prior instrument. The case then rests on the true construction of the contents of the two instruments, and the complete disposition contained in the second must, unless controlled by the context, wholly revoke the first. Thus, in Henfrey v. Henfrey (a), where a testator by will gave his household effects and other benefits to his wife, and all the residue of his estate and effects to A., and appointed him executor, and then by subsequent will left all he possessed "containing furniture, books, &c." to his wife, but did not appoint an executor, the first will, including the appointment of the executor, was held to be wholly revoked. "Containing" was read "inclusive of."

Tenour of later will shewing intention to revoke.

And a will may revoke an earlier testamentary document, disposing of the whole of the testator's property, even although the latter will does not contain an express clause of revocation, and does not dispose of all the testator's property. It is a question of construction on the terms of the two documents (b).

Extrinsic evidence.

If the intention remain in doubt on the face of the documents themselves, extrinsic evidence of the surrounding circumstances and of the testator's intention to revoke the earlier will is admissible (c).

Appointment under power.

A testamentary appointment under a power, and a subsequent will not referring to it, may be taken as together containing the last will of the deceased (d). The question of the revocation of

In the last case the second will could not be found, and parol evidence of its contents was admitted. By the civil law the appointment of an executor was a complete disposition of the personal estate; and in some early cases in the Ecclesiastical Courts the mere appointment of a different executor in a subsequent paper, purporting to be a distinct will, was held to be a revocation of a prior will and appointment, Whitehead v. Jennings and Burt v. Burt, cit. 1 Phillim. 412. But such new appointment was afterwards decided not to be conclusive: Richards v. Queen's Proctor, 18 Jur. 540; Birks v. Birks, 34 L. J. P. 90.

appointments under powers is considered more in detail in another chapter (e). CHAPTER VII.

The general principle above stated applies to codicils which are inconsistent inter se. Instances occur where a codicil is impliedly revoked by a later codicil, the latter being clearly intended by the testator to take the place of the earlier codicil (f). Inconsistent codicils.

The case of Townsend v. Moore (g), is an instance of the reluctance of the Court to refuse probate to two inconsistent testamentary papers (h). There the testatrix executed, on the same day and practically simultaneously, two codicils, the terms of which were in some respects identical, and in other respects inconsistent: it was held (by Vaughan Williams and Romer, L. JJ., Cozens-Hardy, L. J., doubting) that the two codicils were not so inconsistent that they could not stand together, and that both ought to be admitted to probate (i).

In Baker v. Story (j) at estator made two wills disposing of his real estate, which were so inconsistent that the second operated as a total revocation of the first, but the ultimate devise in the second will failed, being void under the Mortmain Acts; it was contended that the devise in the first will took effect, but Jessel, M.R., decided against this contention. But if a codicil does not operate as a total revocation of the will, it seems that the will stands, except so far as the dispositions contained in the codicil are effective (k). Where second will is inoperative.

The question, whether the re-execution of a will revokes a codicil to that will, is discussed in the next chapter (l). Whether re-execution of will revokes codicil.

XI.—Will not Disturbed further than is Necessary.—

"Numerous are the questions," as Mr. Jarman points out (m), "which have arisen in regard to the extent to which a codicil affects the disposition of a will or antecedent codicil, and which are commonly occasioned by the person framing the codicil not having an accurate knowledge or recollection of the contents of the prior testamentary paper.

"In dealing with such cases it is an established rule not to disturb Codicil not to disturb will more than absolutely necessary.

CHAPTER VII.

the dispositions of the will further than is absolutely necessary for the purpose of giving effect to the codicil, as will appear from the following adjudications, which have been selected from a large mass of cases (l), that might be cited in illustration of the principle.

"Thus, where a testator by his will devises lands to A. in fee, and by a codicil devises the same lands in fee to the first son of B. who shall attain the age of twenty-one years and shall assume the testator's name, the first devise will be revoked only quoad the interest comprised in the executory devise in the codicil; so that, until B. has a son who attains his majority and assumes the testator's name, the property will pass to A. under the devise in the will" (m).

So, where a testator devises lands to A. subject to a charge in favour of B., and then by a codicil revokes the devise to A. of the land, which he gives to another, without noticing the charge, the land remains subject to the charge in the hands of the substituted devisee (n). Again, if a testator bequeaths a legacy payable out of two funds, and by codicil there is an absolute gift of one of the funds, but no express revocation of the legacy, it remains payable out of the other fund; and this is so, even if the fund thus taken away is the general personal estate (o).

A codicil revoking a will does not necessarily revoke a prior codicil (p).

(l) Cases as to the combined effect of a will and several codicils are frequently not only very long, but are too special to be of much use as general authorities: Doe d. Hearle v. Hicks, 8 Bing. 475, 1 Cl. & Fin. 20; Hicks v. Doe, 1 You. & J. 470; Alexander v. Alexander, 2 Jur. N. S. 898, 6 D. M. & G. 593; Agnew v. Pope, 1 De G. & J. 49; Patch v. Graves, 3 Drew. 348; Barclay v. Maskelyne, Johns. 124; Farrer v. St. Catharine's Coll., Cambridge, L. R., 16 Eq. 19. The question, whether a codicil was wholly or partially revocatory, was much discussed in Cookson v. Hancock, 1 Kee. 817, 2 My. & C. 606; see also Schofield v. Cahuac, 4 De G. & S. 533; Lord Lovat v. Duchess of Leeds, 2 Dr. & Sm. 62; Re Margitson, 30 W. R. 920; 31 W. R. 257; Wallace v. Seymour, Ir. R. 6 C. L. 343; Beamish v. Beamish, 1 L. R. Ir. 501; Re Howell-Shepherd, [1894], 3 Ch. 649. Where the residue was given to executors by will, and a codicil directed that A. should also be executor, and that the will should take effect as if his name had been inserted therein as executor, A. was held not entitled to a share of residue, Hillersdon v. Grove, 21 Beav. 518; and see Gibson's Trusts, 2 J. & H. 656, stated post, p. 185.

R. 1097, seems to be to the same effect. The original gift may of course be so expressed that the codicil operates as an implied revocation of the legacy: Grice v. Funnell, 1 Sm. & G. 130.

Examples of non-revocation by codicil.

Charge not revoked.

Where a testator by his will specifically devised certain real estate, and by a codicil directed that it should be sold, this was held not to deprive the devisees of their beneficial interests (g).

CHAPTER VII.

Gift not revoked by direction to sell,

So where a testator by his will devised his estates to C. B. for life without impeachment of waste, and by a codicil directed his trustees to let, until the tenant for life married, the lessees to be impeachable of waste, and the rents to be accumulated and laid out in lands to be settled to the same uses; it was contended that this was inconsistent with, and therefore revoked, the devise for life without impeachment of waste; but Sir W. Grant, M.R., held, that there was no inconsistency, and nothing to take the timber from the tenant for life (r).

Again, where a testator by his will bequeathed as follows: "As to my leasehold house in S., and my household goods and furniture there and at S., and as to all my plate, linen, china-ware, pictures, live and dead stock, and all the rest and residue of my goods, chattels, and personal estate," he gave the same to A. By a codicil he revoked the bequest of the residue of his personal estate to A., and gave the same to B. It was held, that the revocation was confined to the "residue," and did not extend to either the leasehold house and furniture, or the other enumerated articles, namely, the plate, &c. (s). So the operation of a codicil which revokes a legacy or devise in favour of a certain person, may be restrained by a recital in the codicil (t). And where by his will a testator devised tithes, and then devised all his real estates of what nature or kind soever, and by codicil devised in a different manner all his real estates of what nature or kind soever, Sir L. Shadwell, V.-C., held that the second gift in the will did not, but that the gift in the codicil did, include the tithes; the Court of Q. B., however, differed from him on the last point, holding that the words "real estates" in the codicil were to be interpreted in the same manner as in the will (u).

expression in codicil confined to its meaning in the will.

Again, in Doe d. Murch v. Marchant (v), where by will an estate was devised to A. in fee, and by codicil "instead of" that devise the estate was given to A. for life, with alternative contingent CHAPTER VII. remainders to her children and her collateral relations, which failed; A. was held entitled to the fee: "instead of the devise in the will" being read "instead of so much of it only as was incompatible with the codicil," and the codicil not disposing of the ultimate fee. And where a trust fund, which by will was given to the children of A. living at a stated period, with a power of advancement in the trustees, was by codicil, "in lieu of such disposition," given to the children of A. living at a different period, and in other respects the will was confirmed; it was held that the power of advancement was not revoked (t). But though the expression "instead of" need not mean total substitution, it naturally implies some substitution; as was held—still in favour of non-revocation—in Barclay v. Maskelyne (u), where the will gave legacies to the six children of A., naming them, and the codicil revoked the legacies "to the children of A., and in lieu thereof" gave a sum amongst "the children of A., to wit" (naming five of them); and it was held that the legacy to the sixth was not revoked, because nothing was substituted for her.

in will not revoked by
in codicil.

Again, in Re Arrowsmith's Trust (v), where by will a testator bequeathed a specific fund to his nephews and nieces, and after the death of his wife gave them all his remaining property; he then by codicil bequeathed certain legacies (one of them to be paid at his wife's death), and gave "all his real and personal estate" to his wife for her life: it was held that the specific gift to the nephews and nieces was not disturbed, and that the codicil was meant only to remove the doubt which might arise on the will whether the wife was to take the residue for life.

testator.

The presumption against implied revocation is strengthened if the testator uses words shewing an intention not to alter his testamentary dispositions except in certain specific respects (w).

gift in codicil.

It sometimes happens that the provisions of the codicil are contrary to law, with the result that the provisions of the will take effect. Thus in Morley v. Rennoldson (x), a testator gave property in trust for his daughter A. for life with remainder to her children; by a codicil he expressed his will to be that A. should not marry, and in case of her marriage or death he gave the property over; she married and died, leaving children: it was held that the will and codicil must be construed together, and that as the condition against her marrying was void, the children were entitled. CHAPTER VII.

The provisions of a codicil may have the effect of removing an ambiguity which appears on the face of the will (y).

Sometimes the express revocation of one gift operates to revoke another, if the two are so closely connected as practically to constitute one gift (yy). A testator gave an annuity of 300*l.* to A., and after her death to her children as she should appoint, and in default of appointment among her children equally; by a codicil reciting that he had devised to A. an annuity of 300*l.*, he revoked the devise of the said annuity and "instead thereof" he devised to A. an annuity of 150*l.*, to be payable and charged in the same manner as the said annuity of 300*l.*: it was held that the annuity to the children of A. was also reduced to 150*l.* (z).

Revocation of part of gift may revoke whole.

It frequently happens that a testator by his will gives property to persons in succession, and by a codicil revokes the gift in such a way as to make it doubtful whether he means to revoke it altogether, or only in part (a). Thus in Sanford v. Sanford (b), a testatrix bequeathed 3000*l.* in trust for C. for life, and after her death for her children, and in case there should be no such children in trust for P.; by a codicil, stating that C. had been largely provided for from other sources, the testatrix deducted the sum of 2900*l.* from the legacy of 3000*l.*, and revoked so much of the legacy accordingly, "leaving her the sum of 100*l.* only, as a remembrance of my affection and regard for her": it was held that the legacy of 3000*l.* was revoked in toto, and that in lieu of it, C. took 100*l.* absolutely. So if there is a gift to A. with a gift over to B., in the event of A. dying under a certain age, or the like, a revocation by codicil of all gifts in the will to A. is primâ facie a revocation also of the gift over to B. (c). On the other hand, if the language of the codicil is restricted, its effect may be to revoke only part of the limitations, and leave the rest in force. As where the gift is revoked "so far as relates to" one of the persons to whom the

(a) Philipp's v. Allen, 7 Sim. 446, was a clear case of revocation in toto. Compare Murray v. Johnston, 3 Dr. & W. 143; Fry v. Fry, 9 Jur. 894. In many cases the construction is assisted or controlled by the fact that the codicil contains a complete substituted gift:

Daly v. Daly, 2 J. & Lat. 753; Wells v. Wells, 17 Jur. 1020. As to whether a substituted legacy is subject to the same qualifications as the original legacy, see Chap. XXX.

(b) 1 De G. & S. 67.

(c) Boulcott v. Boulcott, 2 Dr. 25. In M'Kay v. M'Kay, [1901] 1 Ir. R. 109, the question did not arise, as the gift over would not have taken effect even if the gift to A. had not been revoked.

CHAPTER VII. property is given in succession (d). In Re Whitehorne (e) a testator gave a share of real estate to G. for life, and after his death to his children in fee simple; by a codicil he revoked every gift in his will to or for the benefit of G., and directed that his will should take effect as if the name of G. had never appeared therein: it was held by Buckley, J. (following Alt v. Gregory (f), and Green v. Tribe (g), and distinguishing Tabor v. Prentice (h),) that the revocation extended only to the benefits given to G., and that the interests of his children were accelerated.

Case where held change of trustee merely and no revocation of trusts.

Where a testator directed his trustees, to whom he had given all his property, to carry on his business for ten years, and then to sell and hold the proceeds upon trust, as to one moiety for his daughter and her children, and as to the other moiety for the children of his son, and by a codicil revoked that part of his will which empowered his trustees to sell, and instead thereof authorised his daughter to take possession of his property and to dispose thereof at her discretion: it was held, that this was not an absolute gift to the daughter, but only constituted her a trustee in place of the trustee named in the will (i).

Legacy to executor.

Where a testator by his will appoints an executor, and bequeaths to him a legacy in such a way that it is annexed to the office (j), and by a codicil revokes the appointment of executor, the legacy is also revoked (k). But if the testator shews that the bequest of the legacy is independent of the office—as where he bequeaths it as a “mark of respect” (l), or “as a remembrance” (m),—the legacy is not revoked by the revocation of the office.

Appointment of executor, when revoked.

Where there are several testamentary papers not inconsistent with one another, each of which appoints different executors, probate will be granted to all (n), and this may be done even if the executor appointed by the last paper is described as “sole executor” (o). And a reappointment by codicil of some of the executors appointed by the will together with new executors, does not revoke the appointment of executors contained in the will (p). But if a testator by his will appoints A. and B. his executors, and by a codicil to his "said will" appoints X. "sole executor of this my said will," it seems that this is an implied revocation of the appointment of A. and B. (q).

CHAPTER VII.

If a testator by his will appoints a person trustee and devises land to him upon trust, and by codicil appoints another person to be trustee in his place, this is a revocation of the devise as well of the appointment (r).

Revocation of devise to trustee.

Where a person is appointed to more than one of the offices of guardian, executor, and trustee, a revocation by codicil of his appointment to one of the offices is not a revocation of the appointment to any other office (s); unless the context shews, as by directing "trustees" to pay debts and legacies, that the several offices (of trustee and executor) are to be filled by the same persons (t).

Revocation as to one office does not extend to other offices.

"It may be observed," says Mr. Jarman (tt), "that where a testator, in order to avoid repetition, has by his will declared his intention respecting a property (say Whiteacre), then being devised by him, to be similar to what he had before expressed concerning another property (say Blackacre) antecedently given, and he afterwards by a codicil, or by obliteration, or otherwise, revokes the devise of Blackacre, such revocation does not affect the devise of Whiteacre. Thus, in the case of Darley v. Langworthy (u), where a testator by his will devised a certain estate to certain limitations, and then proceeded to annex thereto another estate, declaring that the same should go unto and be enjoyed by the possessor of the other estate, and not be separated therefrom, and subsequently, by an act in his lifetime, he revoked the devise of the principal estate, the property so annexed was held not to be affected, but went according to the uses declared of the principal estate by the will."

Revocation of devise by reference.

In Martineau v. Briggs (v), a testator devised freehold estates to certain uses, and gave his copyhold and leasehold estates upon trusts to correspond with the uses of the freeholds. By a codicil he devised the freeholds to other uses, but made no mention of Copyholds and leaseholds.

CHAPTER VII. the copyholds and leaseholds : it was held by the House of Lords that the copyholds and leaseholds passed according to the trusts declared by the will.

Money to be applied in purchase of lands. In Bridges v. Strachan (w), the testator devised freeholds to certain uses and bequeathed 3000*l.* to trustees to purchase lands to be settled to the same uses. By a codicil he revoked the devise of the freeholds and devised them to other uses, without referring to the 3000*l.* : it was held by Malins, V.-C., that the 3000*l.* passed under the will in the same way as if the codicil had not been made.

Bequest by reference. So, where a testator by his will bequeathed a specific fund to his residuary legatee after named, and then bequeathed the residue to A., and by a codicil revoked the bequest of the residue, it was held that this was no revocation of the specific bequest (x). And where a testator bequeathed several pecuniary legacies, including one to A., and the residue to his before-mentioned legatees in proportion to their pecuniary legacies ; and by codicil executed after A.'s death gave A.'s pecuniary legacy to B., but was silent as to the residue : it was held that B. was not entitled to A.'s share of residue (y).

Mixed fund. Again, where a testator by his will devised certain freehold property (on failure of the objects of a preceding devise) to trustees to be sold, and directed the produce to be applied upon the trusts thereafter expressed concerning his residuary personal estate ; he then bequeathed his residuary personal estate upon certain trusts, and afterwards by a codicil duly attested for devising freehold estates, revoked the residuary bequest, and disposed of the personalty in a different manner : Sir J. Leach, M.R., held, that by this alteration in the disposition of the personal estate, the devise of the realty was not affected ; the effect being the same as if the testator had in terms applied the trusts in question to the produce of the freehold estate, in which case it is obvious that the revocation by the codicil of the residuary gift of the personal estate by the will, would have been no revocation of the disposition of the produce of the freehold estate ; and his Honor observed, it could make no difference in principle that the testator saves himself the trouble of repeating those trusts, intents, and purposes, by compendious words of reference (z).

Where rule does not apply.

This construction, however, does not apply where personalty is given as an incident or accessory to real estate (a).

CHAPTER VII.

Distinction,
where the first devise is modified only.

Mr. Jarman continues (a): "If the devise of the principal estate is not simply revoked, but is modified only, it is not too hastily to be concluded that the construction adopted in the class of cases just stated would apply, however forcibly the reasoning in some of them, and especially that of the Master of the Rolls in [Francis v. Collier] might seem to conduct to such a conclusion; for a different construction prevailed in the case of Lord Carrington v. Payne (b), where a testator devised his real estate to trustees to be conveyed to certain uses, and bequeathed personal estate to be laid out in land to be settled to such uses and upon such trusts, &c., as he had declared concerning his real estate. By a codicil he revoked so much of his will as directed the settlement of his real estate to those limitations, and devised it to other limitations, the effect being merely to change the order in which some of the devisees were to take. Sir R. P. Arden, M.R., held, that the bequest of the personalty was not revoked. He considered that though the deviser had used the expression 'revoke,' yet the codicil was not a revocation as to the union of the estates, but merely an alteration in the order of the limitations to be inserted in the settlement (of both properties); and that it was no more than if the deviser had with his own hand inserted the name of one devisee before another, and then republished his will."

The case of Lord Carrington v. Payne was referred to by Lord Hatherley in Re Gibson's Trusts (c), where his lordship pointed out that the ground of the decision was that if there is on the face of the will a sufficient indication of intention to unite two sets of estates, one only of which is referred to in the limitations contained in the will, and altered by the codicil, the intention to unite not being altered or revoked, that intention must be carried into effect as far as possible, though in terms the codicil only refers to one set of estates, and not to the other. And in a recent case the decision in Lord Carrington v. Payne was referred to the same principle, and followed by the Court of Appeal (d). In that case the testator devised his H. Lodge estate to certain persons in succession and then gave some heirlooms and a sum of money upon trust "for the person or persons for the time being entitled to the H. Lodge estate under the devise thereof, hereinbefore contained." There was a power to lease H. Lodge with the heirlooms. By a codicil the testator altered the devolution of the H. Lodge estate. It was held by the Court of Appeal (reversing Stirling, J.), that it appeared from the language of the will, and especially from the power of leasing, that the testator intended to unite the possession of the estate with the enjoyment of the personalty.

In Liddell v. Liddell (e), the testator devised real estate upon trust for his nephews and their issue male in succession according to seniority, and directed his personal estate to be held upon such trusts as would best correspond with the trusts of the real estate, By a codicil the testator gave his wife power to alter the order of succession between the nephews, which she did. It was held by the House of Lords that the personal estate devolved in the order of succession as altered by the wife.

The case of Holder v. Howell (f), which is referred to by Mr. Jarman in connection with the case of Lord Carrington v. Payne, is stated elsewhere (g).

Clear gift in will not revoked by doubtful expressions in codicil.

XII.—Ambiguous and informal Expressions will not revoke a clear Gift.—Another principle of construction is, that where the will contains a clear and unambiguous disposition of property, real or personal, such a gift is not allowed to be revoked by doubtful expressions in a codicil. “The principle is perfectly clear, that where you have a distinct disposition made by a will, that disposition cannot be revoked by a codicil except through the medium and use of words equally distinct” (h).

The principle is illustrated by numerous cases.

Thus, in Goblet v. Beechey (i), a testator by his will gave a specific chattel to A.; afterwards by a codicil he gave a number of articles of a different kind, and of much less value, to B., and in enumerating those articles introduced an imperfectly written word, which might be supposed to designate the chattel previously given to A.: it was held, that the bequest to A. was not thereby revoked.

In Bunny v. Bunny (j), a testatrix by her will gave to the seven children of J. B. a legacy of 200*l.* each, and other interests; by a first codicil she revoked the legacies of 200*l.* each to the children of J. B. and all other benefits given them by her will, and in lieu thereof gave only the legacy of 200*l.* each to A., B., C., D., and E., five of the children of J. B. By a second codicil she revoked all the legacies she had left in her will to J. B.'s children; and by a third codicil she revoked the legacy of 200*l.* by a previous codicil to her said will given to A. The question was, whether the legacies given by the first codicil to the plaintiffs B., C., D., and E. were revoked by the second codicil; which depended on what the testatrix meant by the word "will" in the second codicil. The word might mean all the previous unrevoked testamentary papers (k); but if that was what the testatrix meant, it was not easy to account for the subsequent revocation (by the third codicil) of a supposed existing gift to A. in the first codicil. It was true that if she meant the will only without the codicil, then she was doing what was unnecessary, as the legacies in the will had already been revoked by the first codicil; nevertheless it was held, that the former interpretation best answered the apparent meaning of the testatrix, and that the legacies to B., C., D., and E. were not revoked. And this construction was aided by the third codicil, which revoked the legacy given to A. by a previous codicil, showing that the testatrix considered that A., and consequently the plaintiffs also, had at that time legacies left by the previous testamentary papers. And in Cleoburey v. Beckett (l), where legacies were given in a codicil to a class of persons "except A., who is not intended to take any benefit under my will or this codicil"; it was held by Sir J. Romilly, M.R., that these words did not operate as a revocation of an express gift by the will to A. He observed that the words were extremely ambiguous, and did not seem to him to import a distinct and present revocation of the devise in the will.

And where (m) a testatrix having a testamentary power to appoint a sum of 4000*l.* among her husband and children, by her will, after making certain bequests, gave the residue of her property, including the 4000*l.*, over which she had a disposing power, to her husband and children equally; and afterwards, a son having died leaving two children, she by codicil bequeathed the share of her residue which would have gone to him if he had survived her in trust for his children: it was held by Sir E. Kay, J., that the invalid appointment by the codicil did not operate as a revocation pro tanto of the gift of the 4000*l.* made by the will.

Invalid appointment by codicil no revocation of valid appointment by will.

CHAPTER VII.

Erroneous
recital, &c., in codicil.

Intention to revoke may be indicated by informal expressions.

Revocation
mistake.

An erroneous recital or unintelligible provision in a codicil, does not, as a general rule, operate as a revocation of a clear gift in the will (n). But an erroneous recital does not prevent a codicil from operating as a revocation, wholly or partially, of an absolute gift in the will, if the substantive dispositions in the codicil shew that intention (nn).

An intention to revoke, though expressed in loose and untechnical language, or in terms capable per se of a limited interpretation, must nevertheless prevail, if it can be clearly collected from the whole will (o). On this principle, it is not necessary that the gift to be revoked should be accurately referred to (p), or that the legatee by the will should be actually named in the codicil (q).

XII.—Revocation under an erroneous Assumption of Fact.—Mr. Jarman lays it down as a general principle (r), that “Where a testator by a codicil revokes a devise or bequest in his will, or in a previous codicil, expressly grounding such revocation on the assumption of a fact, which turns out to be false, the revocation does not take effect; being, it is considered, conditional, and dependent on a contingency which fails.

“Thus, in Campbell v. French (s), where a testator, having by will bequeathed to the two grandchildren of his late sister 500*l.* each, by a codicil declared that he revoked the legacies bequeathed by his will to such grandchildren, ‘they being all dead,’ and the fact appearing to be that they were living, Lord Loughborough held, that the legacies were not revoked.

“So, in Doe d. Evans v. Evans (t), where a testatrix by her will, dated July, 1819, devised lands to A. for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, with remainder to his daughters in tail; and by a codicil, dated in 1829, after reciting the above devise, and that A. had died without leaving issue, she devised the lands to B. The fact was that A. died in 1827, leaving a posthumous child, whose birth was not known to the testatrix when she made her codicil, but she afterwards became acquainted with it. The Court considered that this was a conditional revocation; and the fact being contrary to what the testatrix supposed, the devise in the will remained in force. CHAPTER VII.

“ Had the testator in the preceding cases, instead of making the death of the devisee or legatee under the circumstances described the ground or reason of the revocation, founded such revocation on his advice or belief only of the fact, it is conceived that the result would have been different. A distinction of this nature seems to be warranted by Att.-Gen. v. Lloyd (u), where a testator having by a will made before the passing of the statute of 9 Geo. 2, c. 36 (v), devised lands and bequeathed personalty to be laid out in lands for charitable uses, made a codicil posterior to the act by which, after reciting that being advised the devise of his lands would be void, and it being his intention that the charity should be continued, and being advised his personal estate could be given, he did by such codicil give his personal estate to the charitable uses before mentioned; and he did thereby give his real estate to B. Though the testator’s notion as to the invalidity of the devise in the will was erroneous (w), it was held that the devise to B. took effect.”

Distinction where the fact itself, and where the advice or belief of the fact, is the ground of revocation.

In Thomas v. Howell (x), a testator by will bequeathed certain charity legacies, and by codicil, “ presuming and believing that the rental of his estate would produce from 16,000*l.* to 18,000*l.*,” he doubled those legacies. The income of his whole estate fell short of 16,000*l.*, and Malins, V.-C., held that the additional bequest failed, as being founded on a mistake.

Where a testatrix by her will bequeathed 300*l.* among such of the children as should be living of E., and by a codicil proceeded as follows: “ I give to my brother’s son C. the 300*l.* designed for E.’s children, as I know not whether any of them are aliye, and if they are well provided for:” Sir R. P. Arden, M.R., held that the original bequest was revoked, and that C. was entitled, though the children of E. were living (y).

The real question in all these cases is, as Mr. Jarman points out in the passage above quoted, whether the revocation is absolute or conditional. If it is absolute it takes effect, although founded on a mistake on the part of the testator.

In Barclay v. Maskelyne (z), where a gift by will to A. was referred to in a codicil as a gift to B., and as lapsed by the death of B., whereupon the subject of gift was otherwise disposed of by the codicil, it was held that the gift to A. was not revoked.

In Allen v. Bewsey (a), a testator devised an estate as copyhold ; by codicil reciting that he had since discovered that the estate was freehold, he confirmed the devise. It turned out that the estate was copyhold, and it appears to have been argued that the confirmation was conditional,—that the devise was meant to stand because (and not unless) the estate was freehold and was in effect revoked : but it was held without difficulty that the intention was to confirm the devise whether the estate was freehold or copyhold, and that there was no revocation.

Implied revocation by the effect of a codicil reviving an earlier will.

XIV.—Revocation of later Will by Codicil reviving earlier Will.—Sometimes a codicil has the effect of impliedly revoking the later of two wills, by expressly referring to and recognising the prior one as the actual and subsisting will of the testator. The difficulty, in most of these cases, is to determine whether the codicil shews an intention to revive the earlier will ; this question is discussed in the next Chapter. If the earlier will is revived, and it is inconsistent with the later will, the result generally is that the later one is impliedly revoked (b). Cases have, however, occurred in which all three documents have been admitted to probate (c).

Even if the earlier will has been destroyed, and therefore cannot be revived, the effect of the codicil may be to revoke the second will (d).

Whether confirmation of will revokes intermediate codicil.

Sometimes a testator makes a will and one or more codicils, and then makes a codicil expressly confirming the will, but not referring to the previous codicils : the question whether in such a case the previous codicils are revoked is considered in the next Chapter (e).

Wills Act, s. 19.

XV.—Revocation by Alteration in Circumstances.—Sec. 19 of the Wills Act enacts that no will shall be revoked by any presumption of an intention on the ground of an alteration in circumstances. The Real Property Commissioners remarked (f) that under the old law a will of real or personal estate could be revoked “ by an alteration in the circumstances of the testator,” but the only examples which they give are marriage, or marriage and the birth of a child. Having regard to the sweeping language of sec. 20, which enacts that no will shall be revoked except in certain specified ways, it is not easy to see the object of sec. 19. In Re Wells's Trusts (g) Stirling, J. relied on the section as negating any presumption of an intention on the part of the testator to revoke his will.

REVIVAL AND REPUBLICATION OF WILLS.

	PAGE		PAGE
I. Revival of Revoked Will or		II. Republication	197
Codicil	192	III. Effect of Republication ...	200

I.—Revival of Revoked Will or Codicil.—Revival is where a testamentary instrument or disposition, which has been revoked or become invalid, is restored or set up by re-execution, or by incorporation in a valid testamentary instrument (a).

Old law. Under the old law, there was another way in which a revoked will or codicil could be revived, for if a testator executed two wills, the latter of which revoked the former, and then revoked the second will, the effect was to revive the first will (b), but this rule was abolished by the Wills Act (c).

Wills Act. The manner in which a revoked disposition can be revived under the present law is set forth in the Wills Act, sect. 22 of which enacts : “ That no will or codicil, or any part thereof, which shall be in any manner revoked, shall be revived otherwise than by the re-execution thereof, or by a codicil executed in manner hereinbefore required, and showing an intention to revive the same ; and when any will or codicil which shall be partly revoked and afterwards wholly revoked shall be revived, such revival shall not extend to so much thereof as shall have been revoked before the revocation of the whole thereof, unless an intention to the contrary shall be shewn.”

The section applies not only where the prior will is revoked by an express clause of revocation, but also where it is revoked by inconsistent dispositions contained in the later will (d).

If the later will is lost, or has been destroyed, its contents may be proved by parol evidence (e).

But such evidence must shew clearly that the contents of the second will were such as to revoke the first. It is not enough to prove that the lost will contained the

CHAPTER VIII.

If a testator makes two wills, the second of which revokes the first, and then destroys the second will for the express purpose of setting up the first, he fails in his object; for parol evidence of his intention is not admissible in order to give effect to that object (f); though it is admissible to prove that the destruction was effected for the sole purpose of reviving the first will; in that case the doctrine of dependent relative revocation (see above, p. 148) prevents the revocation of the destroyed will (g). Otherwise there is an intestacy (h).

Parol evidence inadmissible to show intention to revive.

The same rule applies where the second will is only a partial revocation of the former, or where a codicil partly revokes a will. In such a case, if the testator revokes the second will or the codicil, this does not revive the revoked portion of the first will, and probate is limited to the portions of the first will which were unaffected by the second will or the codicil. The result may be a partial intestacy (i).

Revival of partially revoked will.

By sect. 34, it is provided that the act "shall not extend to any will made before 1838." Now if the first of two inconsistent wills be made before 1838, and the second be destroyed after that date, does sect. 22 extend to the case so as to prevent revival of the first will? Though revived, it would not be republished (j). It would therefore take effect wholly under the old law, and derive no virtue from the new. However, in Dickinson v. Swatman (k), the argument for revival was considered untenable.

Where prior will made before 1838.

Where a will was found with the signature cut off, but gummed on again, it was held that it was not duly re-executed (l).

What is re-execution.

A person who had duly executed his will, married, and subsequently executed another will in favour of his wife and children. In this second will the testator provided that if there were no issue of the marriage living at the death of his wife, he revived and brought into force again his former will, and directed that its provisions should be complied with as though it formed part of his second will. At the time of his death the wife and one child were living. It was held that the first will should be included in the probate (m).

CHAPTER VIII.

Meaning of "erase."

In Wilkinson v. Schneider (n), a testatrix by her will bequeathed certain chattels to her niece, Maria Dyer, then unmarried, absolutely; the niece married a man named Wilkinson, and six years afterwards the testatrix, by a codicil, revoked the bequest, and bequeathed the chattels to Maria Wilkinson and Sarah Butler (another niece), equally. In the following year Sarah Butler died, and a year later the testatrix made another codicil as follows: "My wish is, that in the event of the name of Maria Wilkinson having been erased from my will, it be reinstated as previously there placed." It was held by James, V.-C., that the codicil was inoperative. "I can only say the name of Maria Wilkinson is not erased, and that is all." The construction seems somewhat narrow.

revive.

Where a testator makes two wills, by the second of which he revokes the first, and then makes a codicil which he describes as a codicil to the first will, without referring to the second will, this may have the effect of reviving the first will and revoking the second (o). But this result does not always follow. In the first place, if the first will was revoked by destruction, it is incapable of being revived (p), although a copy of it may be incorporated in the codicil (q). And in the second place, assuming that the first will is still in existence, the codicil must shew an intention to revive it. According to some cases, it is sufficient that the codicil should be described as a codicil to the first will (r). And if there is no ambiguity (s), parol evidence is inadmissible to shew that the reference to the first will was a mistake, and that the testator really meant to refer to the second will (t). Other cases have been

(n) L. R., 9 Eq. 423.

I say nothing as to what would be the effect if the instrument had been destroyed without his knowledge; that question may arise another day." Per Cresswell, J., in Rogers v. Goodenough.

bonis M'Cabe, 31 L. J. Prob. 190, In bonis Stedham, 6 P. D. 205, and In bonis Dyke, 6 P. D. 207, there were other indications of an intention to revive the first will. The cases of Lord Walpole v. Earl of Orford, 3 Ves. 402 (s. c. nom. Lord Walpole v. Earl Cholmondeley, 7 T. R. 138), and Rogers v. Pittis, 1 Ad. 30, were before the Wills Act.

(s) There is a latent ambiguity if a will of a certain date is referred to and there is no will of that date, Jansen v. Jansen, cited 1 Ad. 39. And there is a patent ambiguity if the testator makes a fourth codicil revoking three preceding codicils, and then makes a fifth codicil confirming the will and the four codicils, In bonis Thomson, L. R., 1 P. & D. 8.

(t) In bonis Chapman and Payne v. Trappes, supra; Walpole v. Cholmondeley, 7 T. R. 138.

decided on the principle that a mere reference to the revoked will is not sufficient, and that the Court must satisfy itself by a careful examination of the language of the codicil that the testator intends by it to revive his first will (u). Evidence of the surrounding circumstances is always admissible (v).

If a testator makes a codicil referring to a revoked will by date, but goes on to refer to testamentary dispositions which are not contained in it but in his later will, this is generally sufficient to shew that the reference to the earlier will was a mistake, and that he had no intention of reviving it (w).

In a case (x) where a testator made two wills, the second of which revoked the first, and then executed a codicil which he declared to be a codicil to "my last will" and by which he confirmed "my said will in all respects," and went on to refer to certain provisions contained in the first will and not in the second, it was held that this revived the first will and revoked the second.

Ambiguous
reference.

Where a codicil to a second will contains a recital referring to a previous codicil which was revoked by the second will, this is not sufficient to revive the revoked codicil (y).

Where a codicil expressly confirms the first will, this is sufficient evidence of an intention to revive it (z).

Effect of word "confirm." Physical annexation.

A codicil does not shew an intention (within the meaning of the section) to revive the earlier of two wills by being physically annexed to it (e.g., by a piece of tape): the intention must appear from the contents of the codicil (a). But it seems that if a memorandum in the nature of a codicil is written upon the will and duly executed, it operates to revive the will, although it does not in direct terms refer to the will (b).

Where a testator makes two wills, the latter of which revokes the former, and then makes a codicil reviving the first will, but not expressly revoking the second will, the Court of Probate generally

Confirmation of will partly revoked. In McLeod v. McNab (d), the testator revoked by codicil a bequest contained in his will, and afterwards made another codicil which did not refer to the first codicil, but referred to the will as if the first codicil had never been executed: it was held that this revived the revoked bequest. This construction was aided by the fact that the second codicil confirmed the will in every other particular than as altered by that codicil (e).

Confirmation of codicil. Where a testator made four codicils, the third of which revoked the first and second, and the fourth confirmed the will and former codicils, it was held that the first and second codicils remained revoked (f).

Codicil partly revoking revived will. The latter part of sect. 22 provides, that "when any will or codicil which shall be partly revoked and afterwards wholly revoked shall be revived, such revival shall not extend to so much thereof as shall have been revoked before the revocation of the whole thereof, unless an intention to the contrary shall be shewn." Now if partial revocation of a will—as of a devise of Blackacre to A. in fee—has been caused by a codicil devising Blackacre to B. in fee; and if this codicil has itself been afterwards included in the final revocation of the will, and the "will" is then revived, the devise of Blackacre remains revoked unless a contrary intention is shewn. The will is restored as modified by the codicil, but by a short statutory method, without having recourse to the codicil, concerning which the statute is silent; and it may still be a question what becomes of the codicil. In Neate v. Pickard (g) a will and codicil were revoked by marriage, and afterwards by another codicil the testator confirmed his "last will" without referring to the date; and it was held that both were revived. At the date of the second codicil there were several alterations (unexecuted, it would seem) on the face of the will, and it was further held that the will was revived in its altered condition.

In In bonis M'Cabe (h), the testator made a will and two codicils, all of which he revoked by a later will; he afterwards revived the first will, and it was held that the two codicils were also entitled to probate.

On the other hand, in In bonis Reynolds (i), the testator executed a will and codicil, and then made a second will revoking all previous testamentary papers; he afterwards executed a testamentary paper described as a codicil to the first will, and it was held that this operated to revive the first will, but not the codicil to it. The Court seems to have considered that "an intention to the contrary" was shewn by the contents of the last testamentary paper.

CHAPTER VIII.

Where codicil expressly revoked.

If a testator makes two wills, the second of which revokes the first, and then destroys the first will, and subsequently executes a codicil professing to revive the first will, this intention being incapable of being carried into effect, the question arises whether the second will is revoked by the codicil. In Hale v. Tokelove (j), it was held that the codicil revoked the second will, while in Rogers v. Goodenough (k) probate was granted of the second will, and the codicil. The matter seems to depend on whether the second will and the codicil are or are not too inconsistent with one another to stand together. (l)

Where revival is ineffectual.

II.—Republication.—Republication is sometimes used in the same sense as "revival," but more frequently it is applied to those cases where a valid will or codicil is re-executed or confirmed in such a way as to acquire some force or efficacy which it did not previously possess (m).

Republication is of two kinds, express and constructive (n). Express republication (more properly called re-execution) occurs

(m) See Skinner v. Ogle, 9 Jur. 432. The question of republication was important under the old law, because it had the effect of bringing land acquired since the execution of the will within the operation of a residuary devise contained in the will. It was with reference to this question that Mr. Jarman remarked (1st ed. p. 176): "The operation of a codicil to extend the devise in a will made before 1838 to intermediately-acquired lands, may be negatived by the contents of the codicil itself, indicating a contrary intention; for though the republication takes place without positive intention, yet it can never operate in spite of such intention." See Bowes v. Bowes, 2 B. & P. 500; s. c. nom. Countess of Strathmore v. Bowes, 7 T. R. 482; *Parker v. Under the Statute of Frauds to republish a devise of freehold estate required an attestation by three witnesses; while, on the other hand, a will might have been republished with respect to copyholds and personality without any attestation: Long v. Aldred, 3 Ad. 48; Miller v. Brown, 2 Hagg. 209; Alford v. Earle, 2 Vern. 209; Abney v. Miller, 2 Atk. 599.

CHAPTER VIII. where a testator repeats those ceremonies which are essential to constitute a valid execution, with the avowed design of republishing the will.

What is not re-execution. It will be remembered that where a will has been properly executed, and the testator and witnesses trace over their former signatures with a dry pen, with the intention of re-executing the will, this is not a valid re-execution (o).

In a case where a will had been properly executed, and some years afterwards the testator and the witnesses wrote their names on the will again, it was inferred from the circumstances that this was not done with the intention of re-executing it (p).

Constructive republication. Republication in the ordinary sense of the term (sometimes called constructive republication) takes place where a testator makes a codicil to his will, or executes some testamentary instrument from which the inference can be drawn that he wishes it to be read as part of his will. Thus if the instrument is described as a "codicil to my will," (q), or if it is written on the same piece of paper as the will, and contains a reference to "my executors above named" (r) it operates as a republication of the will. A codicil has this effect even if it is expressed to be conditional on an event which does not happen (s). But if the testator, after making his will, executes another testamentary instrument containing nothing from which the inference above referred to can be drawn (as where the instrument is not described as a codicil and does not refer to the will in any way), its execution will not effect a republication of the will (t).

When republication of will includes codicil. Where a testator makes a will and alters it by one or more codicils, and then makes a codicil confirming the will but not referring to the previous codicils, the question arises whether he thereby confirms

The statement contained in the earlier editions of this work that under the old law the mere execution of a codicil operated as a republication of the will (cited with approval by Sir H. J. Fust in Skinner v. Ogle, 9 Jur. 432) must be read in connection with the rule that the effect of republication was to pass after acquired lands, unless a contrary intention appeared.

them also. Mr. Jarman points out (u) that “it is necessary to bear in mind that every codicil is a constituent part of the will to which it belongs; for in a general and comprehensive sense, a will consists of the aggregate contents of all the papers through which it is dispersed; and, therefore, where a testator in a codicil refers to and confirms a revoked will, it is not necessarily to be inferred that he means to set up the will (using the word in its special and more restricted sense) in contradistinction to, and in exclusion of, any intermediate codicil or codicils which he may have engrafted on it. He is rather to be considered as confirming the will with every codicil which may belong to it; and accordingly, in a case (v) where a person made his will, and afterwards executed several codicils thereto, containing partial alterations of and additions to the will; and by a further codicil, referring to the will by date, he changed one of the trustees and executors, and in all other respects expressly confirmed the will, this confirmation of the will was held not to revive the parts of it which were altered or revoked by the preceding codicils: Sir R. P. Arden, M.R., observing that if a man ratifies and confirms his last will, he ratifies and confirms it with every codicil that has been added to it.”

So in Green v. Tribe (w), where the testatrix made a codicil by which she revoked certain gifts contained in her will, and afterwards made a second codicil confirming her will, but not referring to the first codicil, it was held that the second codicil confirmed the will as modified by the first codicil.

In Follett v. Pettman (x), the testator made two codicils, each confirming the will, and then made a third codicil, by which he confirmed his will “except as altered by” the first codicil: it was held by Kay, J., that no intention to revoke the second codicil was shewn.

On the other hand, in McLeod v. McNab (y), where the confirmation of the will was expressly made subject to the alterations contained in a second codicil, this, combined with various indications that the testator considered the first codicil as superseded, was held to shew an intention on the part of the testator to revoke the first codicil.

In one case in the Ecclesiastical Court it was held, that the mere CHAPTER VIII. fact of the testator ratifying his will and certain specified codicils, did not of itself amount to an implied revocation of other codicils not so specified (z). But, in another case, the Court arrived at a different conclusion, on the comparison of the contents of all the instruments, and looking at the conduct of the testatrix in relation to them (a).

Burton v. Newbery.

The question whether a codicil confirming the testator's will also confirms an intermediate codicil, was discussed by Jessel, M. R., in Burton v. Newbery (b). But the question in that case was simply whether the second codicil gave validity to a gift in the first codicil which was void by reason of the legatee being an attesting witness. It is submitted that the decision was erroneous, because the first codicil was clearly part of the will, and that the cases on the incorporation of unattested or otherwise invalid testamentary papers had nothing to do with the point. It is clear from Crosbie v. Macdoul and Green v. Tribe, that the mere fact that the testator describes his will by a reference to its original date, does not exclude the inference that the will thus referred to is the will as modified by a previous codicil (c). In Burton v. Newbery the effect of the second codicil was either to republish the will and the first codicil, or to republish the will and revoke the first codicil. To hold that it had the latter effect would be to run counter to Crosbie v. Macdoul and other undoubted authorities.

Where a testator makes a will and codicil, and afterwards re-executes the will without referring to the codicil, the question arises whether this revokes the codicil. It seems that in such a case parol evidence is admissible to shew quo animo the will was republished, and thus to shew that the testator could not have intended to revoke the codicil (d) : as for example if his object in re-executing the will is to give effect to some alterations in it (e).

III.—Effect of Republication.—The effect of republication, as a general rule, is to make the will bear the date of republication. Thus in Doe v. Walker (f), where the testator, in February, 1838, executed a codicil confirming his will, executed in February, 1837, Parke, B., said : “ It is clear that the will, so republished by the codicil, and altered by it, together with that codicil, constituted a new will of the date of the codicil.” Consequently the provisions of the Wills Act applied to it. So in Re Fraser (g), where there were several codicils, it was said by the C. A. : "The effect of this is to bring the will down to the date of the [last] codicil, and effect the same disposition of the testator's estate as if the testator had at that date made a new will, containing the same dispositions as the original will, but with the alterations introduced by the various codicils."

The doctrine of republication under the old law was of considerable importance, because by means of it, lands of inheritance acquired by a testator since the execution of his will, were often brought within the operation of any general or residuary devise contained in the will.

Effect on
devise.

For this purpose the operation of the devise was brought down to the date of the codicil (h). And the same principle applied to a devise of estates within a certain locality : thus if a testator devised all his lands in the county of Kent, and after the execution of his will purchased other lands in that county, and then made a codicil attested by three witnesses, the intermediately-acquired lands (not being otherwise disposed of by such codicil) passed under the will (i).

But of course the operation of a codicil to extend the devise in a will, made before 1838, to intermediately-acquired lands, might be negated by the contents of the codicil itself indicating a contrary intention (j).

Contrary
intention.

"In regard to specific devises," Mr. Jarman remarks (k), "the principle that the will speaks from the date of the republication, is to be received with more caution and reserve. It is clear, however, that the devise of a particular property republished by the re-execution of the will, or the execution of a codicil, will, even under the old law, comprise a new estate in that property intermediately-acquired by the testator, and falling within the terms of

If, however, the codicil referred to the land devised by the will in such a way as to shew that the testator did not have the after-acquired land in his mind, the republication did not operate to pass it: Bowes v. Bowes, 2 Bos. & P. 500; Monypenny v. Bristow, 2 R. & My. 117; Hughes v. Turner, 3 My. & K. 666. Compare Re Taylor, post. The doctrine was not of so much importance with respect to wills of personal estate, inasmuch as a residuary bequest, even under the old law, embraced all property of that kind of which the testator died possessed.

the republished devise. As where a testator, by a will made before 1838, devised a leasehold estate, afterwards renewed the lease, and then republished the will, it was held that the renewed lease passed under the devise" (l).

According to some modern cases, however, there is little or no difference between a general and a specific devise, so far as the effect of republication is concerned. Thus in Re Champion (m), the testator specifically devised his freehold cottage and the land thereto belonging, which he described as being "now in my own occupation"; he afterwards purchased two fields adjoining the cottage, and occupied the whole until some years later, when he made a codicil confirming his will: it was held that the two fields passed by the devise.

changed.

Mr. Jarman continues (n): "Republication by codicil or otherwise, however, did not under the old law extend a specific gift in the will to property which that gift was not originally intended to embrace, though answering to the same description. Thus, if a testator by a will made before the year 1838, devised his estate called Blackacre, or bequeathed his horse called Bob, and afterwards sold the estate or horse and bought another of the same name, a subsequent codicil made before the year 1838, did not by its republishing force make the devise or bequest extend to the new purchase."

Whether the same rule applies since the Wills Act, does not seem to have been decided (o); the question as to the disposition of after-acquired property has generally arisen in connection with sect. 24 of the Wills Act (p).

Revoked or

Mr. Jarman continues (q): "So it has been repeatedly held that a legacy to a child, which has been adeemed or satisfied by a subsequent advancement to the legatee, is not revived by a constructive republication of the will by means of a codicil, such codicil not

(l) Coppin v. Fernyhough, 2 Bro. C. C. 292. See also Carte v. Carte, 3 Atk. 180; Alford v. Earle, 2 Vern. 209; Jackson v. Hurlock, 2 Ed. 263. It is not clear whether the decision of Bacon, V.-C., in Wedgwood v. Denton, L. R., 12 Eq. 290, went on the effect of the republication or of s. 24 of the Wills Act. The case is referred to ante, p. 164.

(m) [1893] 1 Ch. 101. The principle of this decision was followed in Re Rayer, [1903] 1 Ch. 685. Without questioning the correctness of either decision, it may be pointed out that the authorities cited by North, J., in Re Champion, relate to the effect of republication on a general devise. In the case of a specific devise its effect seems to have been more restricted. Re Champion is also referred to in connection with the effect of words of description, in Chap. XXXV.

(n) First edition, p. 180.

(o) In Macdonald v. Irvine, 8 Ch. D. 101, the newly-purchased property did not answer the description of the property sold. In Re Pilkington's Trusts, 6 N. R. 246, the decision does not seem to have turned on the question of republication: Chap. XXX. The question in all cases seems to be one of intention: see Re Champion.

indicating an intention to revive the legacy, though containing an express confirmation of the will in the usual general terms" (r). This doctrine is clearly settled:—"It is very true that a codicil republishing a will makes the will speak as from its own date for the purpose of passing after-purchased lands, but not for the purpose of reviving a legacy revoked, adeemed or satisfied. The codicil can only act upon the will as it existed at the time; and, at the time, the legacy revoked, adeemed, or satisfied formed no part of it" (s).

Mr. Jarman continues (t): "The same principle, or course, applies to the objects of gift: it is clear, therefore, that a codicil does not, by its republishing operation, revive a devise or bequest, the object of which has previously died in the testator's lifetime. Thus, if a testator devises lands to his nephew John, who dies in the testator's lifetime, and he afterwards has another nephew of the same names the republication of the will would be inoperative to carry the property to the second nephew John" (u).

The fact that the bequest was to "A., his executors, administrators and assigns" makes no difference (v).

"The effect of republication," says Mr. Jarman (w), "can never extend further than to give the words of the will the same force and operation as they would have had if the will had been executed at the time of republication: it cannot invest with a devising efficacy expressions which originally had none" (x). And although it is true that a codicil confirming a will makes the will for many purposes to bear the date of the codicil, yet this rule is subject to the limitation that the intention of the testator be not defeated thereby. If, therefore, the testator, in making his will, obviously means its provisions to apply to a state of circumstances existing at its date, republication will not make its provisions apply to the state of circumstances existing at the date of the codicil (y). To this principle may be referred the decision in Re Taylor (z). There the testatrix, a married woman, made a will in general terms which was obviously intended to be merely an exercise of a power of appointment over property comprised in her marriage settlement; on the death of her husband she became entitled to real and personal estate, and made a codicil disposing of the real estate: it was held that although this operated as a confirmation of the will, it did not alter its construction or scope; it followed that the personalty was undisposed of.

Republication does not cure defect of expression in will.

CHAPTER VIII.

It seems that if a testator executes a codicil republishing his will, its effect is the same whether he expressly confirms his will or not (a).

Lapse of residuary devise or bequest.

"If the residuary devise contained in a will has itself lapsed, of course the republication of the will is inoperative to impart new efficacy to the devise, as well where the lapse affects an aliquot share only of the residue, as where it embraces the entirety. Thus, a testator devise the residue of his lands to A., B., and C., as tenants in common in fee, and A. dies, and then the testator makes a codicil to his will, by the effect of which the will is republished, he would nevertheless die intestate as to one-third, since the subsisting devise, which originally embraced two-thirds only, could never, by the mere effect of the republication, be expanded into a gift of the entirety" (aa).

And the rule is the same in the case of a residuary bequest of personalty (b).

Where a will, made since the act, is so worded as to exclude after-acquired lands from a general devise, a codicil republishing the will has no more effect in altering the effect of the general devise, than it would have had if both instruments had been subject to the old law (c).

Where exception from residuary gift.

When property is excepted from a residuary bequest, and specifically disposed of, and the specific bequest fails by lapse or otherwise, the property, as a general rule, falls into the residue under the doctrine of Blight v. Hartnoll (d). But if the specific bequest fails by the death of the legatee, and the testator afterwards republishes the will, the effect of this is to exclude the doctrine, because the will is then read as if the testator had excepted the property from the residuary bequest without making any disposition of it (e).

It will be remembered that a will executed before January 1, 1838, is subject to the provisions of the Wills Act if it has been republished since that day (f).

Application of Wills Act to will made before 1838.

The doctrine of republication was formerly of importance in the case of wills made by married women, because under the old law a married woman had no general testamentary capacity; but the law has been recently altered in this respect (g).

The effect of republication in giving validity to a legacy which was originally void by reason of the legatee being an attesting witness to the will, has been already referred to (h).

The application of the doctrine of republication to appointments under powers is considered elsewhere (i).

It sometimes happens that after a will has been made, a statute is passed which affects the dispositions of the testator, and that he afterwards executes a codicil so as to republish the will. The question then arises whether the will is to be deemed to have been made since the passing of the statute. In Re Elcom (j), the will was made before, and the codicil after, the passing of Malins's Act, and it was held that the will was not an instrument "made after 31st December, 1857," within the meaning of the act.

Where statutory alteration has been made after execution of will.

In Re Rayer (k), the will was made before, and the codicil after, the passing of the Customs, &c., Act, 1888, by which legacy duty was abolished in respect of annuities charged on land and other duties substituted; by his will the testator had directed certain annuities charged on land to be paid without any deduction except for legacy duty and income tax: it was held that by republishing his will the testator must be taken to have intended the annuitants to pay the substituted duties.

"The doctrine of republication," as Mr. Jarman remarks, "has lost much of its interest under the statute 1 Vict. c. 26, not, indeed, by the effect of the provision which dispenses with publication as part of the ceremonial of execution (though this may seem to render Republication how far affected by the Wills Act.

It is to be remembered, however, that with respect to the objects of gift, the statute leaves the pre-existing law untouched ; though, considering how slight an effect is produced by a republishing codicil in this respect (for we have seen that it does not revive a lapsed gift), this forms no very large exception to the remark, as to the diminished practical interest of the doctrine of republication, in connection with the new law " (m).

At the present day, however, the tendency of the Courts seems to be to give greater effect to republication than Mr. Jarman thought warranted by the old authorities.

Republication cannot invalidate a valid gift.

It would seem, on general principles, that if a testamentary gift is valid at the date of the will, it cannot be invalidated by mere republication of the will. In Re Moore (n) a testator gave property to a charity ; as the will was executed more than three months before his death, the gift took effect under the Charitable Donations and Bequests (Ireland) Act, 1844. The will was republished by a codicil made less than three months before the testator's death. It was held that the charitable gift was not invalidated.

I.—Gifts for Illegal Purposes, &c.—A testator cannot, of course, devote any part of his property to an illegal object, either directly, or by means of a condition (a), or a secret trust (b).

Nor can a testator direct that his property shall not be occupied or used for a certain period. Thus in Brown v. Burdett (c), a testatrix devised buildings to trustees upon trust that they should be blocked up for twenty years; it was held that this direction was nugatory, and that there was an intestacy during the twenty years. So a direction to carry on a business for a certain number of years, without giving any one the benefit of the profits made that during period, is inoperative (d).

The effect of a direction by a testator that his heir at law or next of kin shall not take any part of his estate is considered elsewhere (e).

II.—Superstitious Uses.—About the period of the Reformation, statutes were passed to defeat or prevent dispositions of property to purposes which were then accounted superstitious (f). Thus the statute 1 Edw. 6, c. 14, declared the king entitled to all real (g) and certain corporate personal property theretofore disposed of for the statute 1 Edw. 6, c. 14, the preamble of which refers to the "superstition and errors" which had been brought into men's minds "by devising and phantasying vain opinions of purgatory and masses satisfactory, to be done for them which be departed."

(g) See Att.-Gen. v. Vivian, 1 Russ. 226; Att.-Gen. v. Fishmongers' Company, 2 Beav. 151, 5 My. & Cr. 11.

CHAPTER IX.

the perpetual finding of a priest, or maintenance of any anniversary or obit or other like thing, or of any light or lamp in any church or chapel. This statute affects previous dispositions only. But by the earlier statute 23 Hen. 8, c. 10, all uses thereafter declared of land (except for terms of not more than 20 years) to the intent to have obits perpetual, or the continual service of a priest or other like uses, were made void. There is no statute making superstitious uses void generally (i), and the latter statute does not relate to personality. But, as Mr. Jarman points out (ii): "Superstitious uses which are not within the letter of these statutes, are nevertheless void, by the general policy of the law; and, in such cases, if charity be not the object, but the design of the bequest be to secure a benefit to the testator himself (as to say masses for his soul, &c.), the testator's own representative (who would be entitled if there was no such gift), and not the Crown, would be let in" (j). And as this principle of English law applies to personal estate as well as to land, it will invalidate a bequest of personalty for masses or like purposes, made by a testator domiciled in England to persons resident in a foreign country in which the purposes are to be carried out, and where such gifts are allowed by law (k).

Secret trusts.

It has been decided, that devisees may be compelled to disclose whether they take subject to a secret trust of this nature (l).

It is clear, that not only is a bequest to the poor ministers of Protestant dissenters good, but one having for its object the

Including the souls of others with his own in the intended benefit will not save the bequest, see s. cc. In West v. Shuttleworth there was a residuary bequest, and yet the void pecuniary legacies were held to belong to the next of kin. On this point, see Shanley v. Baker, 4 Ves. 732; and observe that in West v. Shuttleworth, the residuary legatees made no claim to the void legacies, and in fact supported the bequest of them. If the superstitious use had charity for its object, it would be executed cy-près, see Cary v. Abbot, 7

Ves. 495, and per Lord Eldon, 19 Ves. 487. But it is not clear that any use (except of the kind mentioned in the stat. 1 Edw. 6) would now be held void solely as being superstitious. In Thorn-ton v. Howe, 31 Beav. 14, Lord Romilly held that even a trust for propagating the sacred writings of Joanna Southcote would be enforced by the Court. Those writings aver that Joanna Southcote was with child by the Holy Ghost, &c., &c., delusions almost identical with those which in Smith v. Tebbitt, L. R., 1 P. & D. 398, were held to render a woman possessed by them incapable of making a will.

propagation of their religious opinions is also valid ; provided that such opinions, although at variance with the doctrines of the Established Church, are not contrary to law (m) ; thus bequests to an Unitarian chapel (n), or for the benefit of poor Irvingite ministers (o), or to the minister of a specified Baptist chapel (p), are valid.

Before the statute 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 115, bequests for the propagation of the Roman Catholic religion were unlawful (q) ; but sect. 1 of that act, after noticing the acts in favour of Protestant dissenters, and a Scotch act imposing penalties on Roman Catholics ; and reciting, that notwithstanding the provisions of various acts passed for the relief of His Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects, doubts had been entertained whether it were lawful for His Majesty's subjects professing the Roman Catholic religion in Scotland to acquire and hold as real estate the property necessary for religious worship, education, and charitable purposes, and that it was expedient to remove all doubts respecting the right of His Majesty's subjects professing the Roman Catholic religion in England and Wales to acquire and hold property necessary for religious worship, education, and charitable purposes, enacts, " That His Majesty's subjects professing the Roman Catholic religion, in respect of their schools, places for religious worship, education, and charitable purposes in Great Britain, and the property held therewith, and the persons employed in or about the same, shall, in respect thereof, be subject to the same laws as the Protestant dissenters are subject to in England in respect to their schools and places for religious worship, education and charitable purposes, and not further or otherwise." By sect. 3, the act is not to extend to any suit actually pending, or commenced, or any property then in litigation, in any Court in Great Britain (r).

But as to the former alternative it is notorious that the Court of Chancery unhesitatingly entertains suits for carrying into effect trusts of places of worship belonging to Protestant Dissenters. The principles on which it deals with such trusts are stated with great fulness and perspicuity by Lord Eldon, in Att.-Gen. v. Pearson, 3 Mer. 353, which bears more immediately on the position of Unitarians, as to whom see now 7 & 8 Vict. c. 45, and of whom Lord Campbell said, 2 H. L. Ca. 863, that he had no doubt they would now on most occasions be considered as Protestant Dissenters.

CHAPTER IX.

Effect of act.

It has been held that the act is retrospective, i.e., that it applies to the will of a testator who died before its passing (s); and also, that it authorises a bequest for the promotion of the Roman Catholic religion, as it places persons of this persuasion on the same footing as Protestant dissenters, the diffusion of whose religious tenets (as already observed) may be the subject of a valid trust. It is settled, however, that the act has no effect in rendering valid gifts to superstitious uses, as legacies to priests for offering masses for the repose of the testator's soul, &c. (t); nor, it is presumed, would it render valid such a trust as that which was the subject of discussion in De Themmines v. De Bonneval (u), namely, for printing and publishing a book which taught that the Pope had in all ecclesiastical matters a supremacy which was paramount even to the authority of the temporal sovereign. The case arose before the statute referred to, but Sir J. Leach rested his decision entirely on the ground that to allow such a publication was against public policy.

Roman Catholic Charities Act, 1860.

The Roman Catholic Charities Act, 1860, in effect provides that no lawful charitable trust for the exclusive benefit of Roman Catholics shall be invalidated by the addition of a superstitious trust, but that in every such case the Chancery Division may apportion the property so that part of it may be subject to the lawful trust and the residue applied to a lawful charitable trust for the benefit of Roman Catholics.

Jews.

Jews also are now by statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 59, placed on the same footing as Protestant dissenters (v).

Law of Ireland.

It may be mentioned that in Ireland it is lawful for a testator to bequeath money for masses for the souls of the dead (w). Such a bequest is a charitable gift, even if there is no direction that the Goldsmid*, 8 Sim. 614. The only difference between 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 115, s. 1, and 9 & 10 Vict. c. 59, s. 2, is the omission from the latter enactment of the words, "and the persons employed in or about the same." This enactment also has been held to be retrospective, Re Michel's Trusts, 28 Beav. 39.

masses are to be said in public (y). But a bequest to members of a particular monastic order for saying masses is void (z). CHAPTER IX.

Apparently a similar rule would be applied to a bequest by a person resident in a British colony, for the purpose of performing ceremonies recognised by the religion or customs of the colony (a). British Colonies.

III.—Charitable Gifts.—Gifts of property for charitable purposes are in some respects favoured, and in others discouraged, by the law. Thus, while gifts of land by will for charitable purposes are subject to the statutory restrictions mentioned below (see sects. vi., x.), it is no objection to a gift of property for a charitable purpose that the purpose may last for ever, for gifts to charities are an exception to the general principle which forbids any disposition by which property is made inalienable for an indefinite period (c). Restrictions on gifts to charities.

Not void for perpetuity.

It must, however, be remembered that if a charitable gift is not immediate, but is made conditional upon a future and uncertain event, "it is subject to the same rules and principles as any other estate depending for its coming into existence upon a condition precedent. If the condition is never fulfilled, the estate never arises: if it is so remote and indefinite as to transgress the limits of time prescribed by the rules of law against perpetuities, the gift fails ab initio" (d). Thus a gift for the benefit of a volunteer corps, although charitable, is void if it is made to take effect "on the appointment of the next lieutenant-colonel" (e). Conversely, if property is given upon trust for a charity, with a proviso that on the happening of an event which may not take place within the limits allowed by the Rule against Perpetuities, the property is to go over to private individuals, this gift over is void (f). But property may be given to Charity A., subject to a proviso that on But may be void for remoteness.

the happening of a certain event it shall go over to Charity B., and the transfer will take effect notwithstanding the remoteness of the event (g).

So if property is effectually and absolutely devoted to charity, a direction that it shall not be applied in a certain way until after an event which may not happen within the period allowed by the Rule against Perpetuities, does not affect the validity of the gift (h).

Resulting trust.

Charities are to some extent an exception to the doctrine of resulting trusts, for if the income of property is given for charitable purposes, and the income afterwards increases so that there is a surplus beyond what is required, this is also treated as devoted to charity (hh).

What is a charity?

Stat. 43 Eliz. c. 4.

Charity has been defined to be a gift to a general public use (i). In order to ascertain what are charitable purposes, recourse is usually had to the preamble of the statute 43 Eliz. c. 4 (j), which enumerates various kinds of charity: viz. the relief of aged, impotent, and poor people (k), maintenance of sick and maimed soldiers and mariners, schools of learning (l), free schools and scholars in universities; repair

(j) This statute is repealed by the Mortmain, &c., Act, 1888, but the preamble is set forth in the 13th section of the latter act, which in effect provides that references made in any enactment or document to charities within the meaning, purview and interpretation of the act of Elizabeth, "shall be construed as references to charities within the meaning, purview and interpretation of the said preamble." As to the meaning of the term "charitable purposes" in the Income Tax and Corporation Duty Acts, see Reg. v. Comm. of Income Tax, 22 Q. B. D. 510, where a gift to persons "not under fifty years of age" was held to be a good charitable gift to "aged" persons within the meaning of this statute. But the benefit of such a charity is confined to persons who are in want: see post, p. 218. The use of the words "aged," "impotent," or "poor," is not necessary to a good charitable gift: see Att.-Gen. v. Comber, 2 Sim. & St. 93; Powell v. Att.-Gen., 3 Mer. 48. In Re Estlin, 72 L. J. Ch. 687, a gift for the support of a Home of Rest for school teachers was held good, partly because it was for the benefit of impotent persons. But in Re Good, [1905] 2 Ch. 60, it was held that a gift for the benefit of "old" officers of a regiment meant "former" officers, and was therefore bad. As to the meaning of the term "poor," see Att.-Gen. v. Duke of Northumberland, 7 Ch. D. 745.

(l) Att.-Gen. v. Nash, 3 Br. C. C. 587; Att.-Gen. v. Earl of Lonsdale, 1 Sim. 105, post, p. 217; Kirkbank v. Hudson, 7 Pr. 212, and the cases on educational charities cited post. Of course an educational institution is not prevented from being a charity by the fact that it of bridges, ports, havens, causeways (m) churches, sea-banks (n), and highways; education and preferment of orphans; the relief, stock, or maintenance for houses of correction; marriages of poor maids; supportation and help of young tradesmen, handicraftsmen, and persons decayed; relief or redemption of prisoners or captives (o); and aid or ease of any poor inhabitants, concerning payment of fifteens, setting out of soldiers, and other taxes.

Charity is not confined to the objects comprised in this enumeration; it extends to all cases within the spirit and intendment of the statute. Thus, gifts (p) for the erection of water-works for the use of the inhabitants of a town (q); to be applied for the benefit of a place (r), or for "charities and other public purposes in" a parish (s), or for the general improvement of a town (t), or for the establishment of a life-boat (u), or of a botanical garden (v); or museum (w); to the trustees and for the benefit of the British Museum (x); to the Royal, the Geographical, and the Humane, Societies (y); to the widows and orphans (z), or the poor inhabitants (a) of a parish ("poor" being construed those not receiving edification (l), although combined with other objects (such as a gift for the furtherance of Conservative principles and religious and mental improvement (m), or for ringing church bells in commemoration of the restitution of the monarchy (n)) have been respectively held to be charitable. And in the case of charitable gifts for religious purposes the Court makes no distinction between one sort of religion, or one sect, and another (o). Their promotion or advancement are all equally "charitable," provided their doctrines are not subversive of all religion, or all morality (p). It seems that even a gift for religious purposes generally, is prima facie valid (q). An advowson may be the subject of a charitable trust if it is to be held for the benefit of a certain place, such as a particular parish (r). But a simple devise of an advowson upon trust from time to time to present a fit and proper person to the living, is not a charitable trust (s). Whether such a trust would be made a charitable one by restricting the choice of incumbents to clergymen of a particular type of thought, or to members of a particular society, seems doubtful (t).

A charity may be created for the benefit of persons resident in

In Pare v. Clegg, 29 Beav. 589, the doctrines of Robert Owen (as to which see also Russell v. Jackson, 10 Hare, 214) were held by Romilly, M. R., to be visionary and irrational, but not illegal as being irreligious or immoral. The Court is sometimes compelled to declare good as a charitable bequest what it deems of very doubtful public utility: per Lord Selborne, L. R. 16 Eq. 24.

CHAPTER IX.

It has been said that "charity" in its legal sense comprises four principal divisions: trusts for the relief of poverty; trusts for the advancement of education and learning; trusts for the advancement of religion; and trusts for other purposes of general public utility, not falling under any of the preceding heads (v). But these divisions are not mutually exclusive, and there may be a charity for purposes which are both eleemosynary and ecclesiastical (v). On the other hand, it is not every object of public utility that constitutes a good charity (x). Indeed, it is difficult to lay down any principle as to what constitutes a valid charitable trust for purposes of general public utility. It has been held that a charitable trust may be created for providing the inhabitants, or a particular class of the inhabitants of a place, with a privilege of fishing, pasture, or turbary (y), or even generally for their benefit (z). So gifts in aid of the public revenue or local rates and other burdens are charitable (a). On the other hand, a trust may be void because its benefits are so limited that it amounts to a private charity (b), or because it is too indefinite and vague (c).

A charity may have a double purpose.

It is evident from the preceding examples that, to constitute a charity in the legal sense, the poor need not be (though they commonly are) its sole or especial objects (d); for example, a trust for the advancement of education or learning is a good charitable purpose, without being restricted to destitute persons (e). And Charity need not be eleemosynary.

CHAPTER IX.

obviously it would be no objection to a gift for a public purpose that it might incidentally benefit wealthy persons. But a gift the main object of which is to add to the income or resources of persons who are, or may be, in possession of a competence, is not charitable (f). In the popular sense of the word, however, "charity" connotes the idea of poverty, and this sometimes affects the construction of gifts which are obviously intended to be charitable, so that a gift for the benefit of a certain class of the inhabitants of a place may be construed to mean poor persons belonging to that class; thus a legacy to "the widows and orphans" of a certain place was held to mean the poor widows and orphans of that place (g).

Legacy may be charitable though payable at once to individuals.

A legacy payable once for all may be charitable, as well as one given for the creation of a perpetual trust; as, a legacy to the widows and orphans of a named place (h); or to six honest and sober clergymen that are not provided with a living of 40*l.* (i); such gifts could not in their nature have proceeded from motives of personal bounty to particular individuals.

Charities for poor persons generally.

A gift for the benefit of poor persons generally is a good charitable gift (j). And a gift for the benefit of one or more poor persons belonging to a certain locality, or to a certain station in life or vocation, to be selected in manner directed by the testator, is also a good charitable gift (k). So a bequest to form a pension or superannuation fund for "old and worn-out clerks" in the employment of a certain firm, is a good charitable gift, being for the benefit of a section of the public (l). But in order that a gift for the benefit of poor persons belonging to a certain class may be valid, it must be for the benefit of persons who are actually poor, and not for the benefit of the least wealthy of a wealthy class; therefore, a bequest for the benefit of "the poorest" of the testator's kindred cannot be applied for the benefit of any kindred who are not really poor (m). And persons in receipt of parochial relief are, prima facie, not entitled to share in a bequest for poor persons (mm).

In Thomas v. Howell (n), the testator bequeathed 200*l.* to each of ten poor clergymen of the Church of England, to be selected by his friend J. O.; if these were charitable legacies, they would have had to abate; Malins, V.-C., held that the legacies were not charitable, thinking apparently that as soon as the ten poor clergymen were selected by J. O., the legacies took effect in the same way as if their names had been inserted in the will; the V.-C. drew a distinction in this respect between a legacy payable at once, and a legacy for the maintenance of a permanent charity. This view, however, is contrary to the decision in A.-G. v. Glegg (o), and is, it is submitted, unsound.

In Liley v. Hey (p), the testator devised real estate to trustees upon trust out of the rents to make certain annual payments and to distribute the remainder amongst the families of twenty-four persons, named in the will, "according to their circumstances, as in the opinion of the said trustees, they may need such assistance." It was held by Wigram, V.-C., that this was not a devise for charitable purposes within the meaning of the Mortmain Act, and that the trust was good for so long a period as the Rule against Perpetuities would allow, by which he appears to have meant that it was good during the lives of the persons who took immediately on the testator's death. The decision has been questioned (q) on the ground that it is inconsistent with Isaac v. Dejries and A.-G. v. Price, but it is submitted that it may be supported on the theory that the testator meant the devise to be for the benefit of the persons designated by him who should be living at the time of his death, for the trust was not one of selection, but of distribution; the objects of it were designated by the testator himself and were Hughes*, 2 ib. 105), was held not to be charitable. Lord Hardwicke's note of the decision is that it was good, because really a legacy to sixty particular ejected ministers to be named by Baxter, and "as if a legacy of those sixty individuals" (7 Ves. 76); but that appears to be in answer to the argument (1 Vern. 249) that "to suffer them to take by such a devise was almost to make a corporation of them, and would keep them in a perpetual schism." And as to the decision of the Court below that the clergyman could not take, elsewhere (1 Ves. sen. 537) he says of the case, "The Court held the charitable use was not contrary to law."

Poor
relations.

A gift for the perpetual benefit of the poor relations of the testator or any other person is a good charitable gift (t), subject, of course, to the rule that the persons entitled to participate in it must be actually, and not merely relatively poor, and that if there is more than enough to provide for the persons so entitled, the surplus must be applied in some manner to be determined by the Court (u).

An immediate gift of property for the testator's poor relations stands on a different footing, and it is not easy to extract a definite principle from the decisions. According to several old cases, such a gift is not charitable, but is saved from being void for uncertainty by being confined to the testator's statutory next-of-kin, and this even where the selection and distribution are to be made by a person designated for the purpose by the testator (v). According to other authorities, such a gift is a charitable bequest (w), and if there is a person designated by the testator to distribute the legacy, he may select any of the testator's poor relations, however remote (x).

Savage.

In Mahon v. Savage (y) a testator bequeathed to his executor 1,000*l.* to be distributed among his (the testator's) poor relations, or such other objects of charity as should be mentioned in his private instructions. He left no instructions; and it was held by Lord Redesdale that the testator's design was to give to them as objects of charity, and not merely as relations; that a relation within the statute who had become rich before distribution was not entitled to a share, and that a share was not transmissible to representatives was not the ground of Sir T. Sewell's judgment in Brunsdon v. Woolredge is clear; for the subject of gift under the will of William (dated 1757) included money to arise by sale of land, a gift of which to charitable uses would have been void by 9 Geo. 2, c. 36 (1736).

R., held that a devise of real estate to trustees "in trust to pay the rents to such of my poor relations as my trustees shall think most deserving," was a charitable trust, and therefore void as a gift of an interest in land.

(i.e., of an object who died before distribution). He also thought that the executors had a discretionary power of distribution, and need not include all the testator's poor relations, and that poor relations beyond the statute might be admitted. Mr. Jarman remarks (z): "This case is clearly distinguishable from a simple gift to poor relations; for the additional words denoted that charity was the main object of the testator."

If there is no person designated by the testator to distribute the legacy, and the Court is therefore called upon to make the distribution, it will be confined to the statutory next-of-kin (a). If the estate is being administered by the Court, the person to whom the testator has given the power of selection, will be directed by the Court to prepare a scheme (b). In some cases, where there is no person appointed by the testator to make the distribution, the Court has directed the Master to prepare a scheme (c), while in other cases it has simply divided the legacy among the statutory next-of-kin (d).

A gift to procure masses for the soul of the testator and others is not charitable (e); nor is a gift to a convent of nuns whose sole object is sanctifying their own souls, and not performing any external duty of a charitable nature (f); nor a gift for the purchase of advowsons or presentations (g) unless they are to be held on a charitable trust (h); nor a gift for the erection or repair of a monument, vault, or tomb (i), whether it be to the memory or for the

Again, bequests for purposes of hospitality (m), or benevolence (n), or benevolence and liberality (o), or general utility (p), or for pious purposes (q), or for public (r), or philanthropic (s) purposes, or for "emigration uses" (t), or for the encouragement of a sport or pastime (u), are not charitable bequests; and a gift to one of the chartered companies of the City of London to increase their stock of corn, which they are (or were) compelled to keep for the London market, is not charitable, since it is in effect a gift to the company absolutely (v).

There are, however, numerous cases in which gifts expressed in general or vague terms have been held on the context to be confined to purposes which are charitable (w).

In Ommanney v. Butcher (x) the testatrix declared as to certain money that she wished it to be given in private charity. Sir T. Plumer, M. R., held that the words did not create a trust which could be carried into effect. Assisting individuals in distress was private charity; but such a purpose could not be executed by the Lord Ellenborough suggested (3 M. & Sel. 407) that although repairing a donor's own tomb was not a charitable purpose, it was otherwise where the tomb was for his family. But the statute had been complied with, and the later cases admit no such distinction. These cases also shew that a trust for the perpetual repair of a tomb, not being charitable, is void as a perpetuity.

Court or the Crown (y). So a gift to found a private museum (z), or library (b), or in aid of a subscription library (c), or of a mechanics' institute (d), or a trade union (e), or for the benefit of persons engaged in a certain trade (f), or for the benefit of an orphan school kept by an individual substantially at his own expense (g), or for the benefit of the children of the tenants on an estate (h), is not charitable.

Whether a gift to a friendly society is charitable or not, would seem to depend on the question whether, by the rules of the particular society, poverty is or is not a necessary element to entitle a member to the benefits of the society (i).

Friendly Society.

If a testator gives property for a purpose, beneficial to the public, or a section of it, but subject to a proviso that the public shall acquire no rights, no charitable trust is created (j).

Mr. Jarman lays it down, as a general principle (k), that "a gift will not be deemed charitable merely from the nature of the professional character of the devisee, or on account of the testator having accompanied the gift with an expression of his expectation that the devisee would discharge the duties incidental to such character, however intimately those duties may concern the welfare of others, as this merely denotes the motive of the gift, and not that the devisee is to take otherwise than beneficially. Thus, in Doe d. Phillips v. Aldridge (l), where the devise was to the Rev. A. A., a dissenting minister (described as preacher at the meeting-house of L.) for life, the testator adding, 'And I further expect that he will, with the help of God, after my decease, without delay, settle and forward everything in his power, to promote and carry on the work of God at L. aforesaid, both in his lifetime and after his decease;' it was contended, that the devise to A. A. was void, as charitable, being not in his individual capacity, but in the character of preacher, and in confidence that he would discharge the duties of that station. But the Court held that it was not charitable, and thought the point too clear for discussion.

Trusts too indefinite to be pronounced charitable.

"It generally happens, however, that where the words of the will fail to point out charity as the object of the testator's gift, they nevertheless shew that he meant the devisees or legatees to take the property as trustees, and not for their benefit. Thus in the case of Morice v. Bishop of Durham (m), (which is a leading case) it was decided that a bequest to the Bishop of D., to dispose of to such objects of benevolence and liberality as he should approve, was not charitable, and that the bishop was a trustee for the next of kin."

Mr. Jarman also cites Doe d. Toone v. Copestake (n), where an estate was devised to trustees, to be applied by them and the officiating ministers of the congregation or assembly of the people called Methodists assembling at L., and as they should from time to time think fit to apply the same; it was held that the devise was not charitable, the application being left to the trustees still more indefinitely than it was in Morice v. Bishop of Durham, and it was not argued that the trust was restricted to charitable purposes merely because the Methodist ministers were appointed trustees with others (o).

Gift to charitable society,

But a gift to a society or institution having a charitable object is prima facie a gift for the purposes of the society or institution, and is therefore a good charitable gift (p). Thus a gift to a religious institution or society is a charitable gift, unless it appears in the particular case that the institution or society is not charitable, in which case the gift is only good if it is intended for the benefit of the persons who are members of the institution or society at the testator's death (q). So a gift to the governors of a charitable institution is a good charitable gift (r). And a gift to the minister for the time being of a chapel, or to the minister and his successors (s), or to the vicar and churchwardens for the time being of a parish (t), is primâ facie a good charitable gift; and none the less so because the property is to be applied in such manner as the legatees think fit (u). And where a testator gave a legacy to three persons by name, "A., B., and C., Nazareth House, Hammersmith, or their successors," and it appeared that A., B., and C. were at the date of the will, and at the testator's death, holders of official positions in a religious and charitable community occupying Nazareth House, it was held that the testator by the use of the word "successors" must have meant their successors in office, and that the bequest was therefore made to them as officials of the charity (v).

But where a testator made a bequest to the C. O. S., a charitable society, upon trust to apply one-tenth of the income for the purposes of the society, and to pay the residue to such other society or societies as in the opinion of the governing body of the C. O. S. should be most in need of help, it was held that no general charitable intention could be inferred from the terms of the gift, because the "other society or societies" were not necessarily charitable. The gift, therefore, failed as to nine-tenths of the bequest (w).

If money is bequeathed to a municipal corporation upon trusts or for purposes which the testator does not specify, it will not be assumed that they were meant to be charitable (x).

In the last case the gift to the convent, though held not charitable, was still treated as a trust for the purposes of the institution; not involving a perpetuity, but capable of being performed by the existing members spending the gift as they pleased: (as to which, see Brown v. Dale, 9 Ch. D. 78; and cf. Thomson v. Shakespear, Carne v. Long, Re Clark's Trust, sup., which were void for perpetuity). In Aston v. Wood, L. R., 6 Eq. 419, a legacy "to the trustees of Zion Chapel, to be apportioned according to statement appending," no such statement being forthcoming, was held to fall into the residue. The express reference to a trust to be declared appears to have rebutted any presumption in favour of the chapel. Moreover, there was the same difficulty as in Doe v. Copestake, supra, namely, that the testator appointed trustees of his own, either in addition to or in substitution for the trustees of the chapel.

because the purpose which the testator had in mind has become impossible (z), or because the subject-matter of the gift is uncertain (a), but a charitable gift is never void for uncertainty in the object (aa). Consequently a gift for charitable purposes is good, even if the testator leaves the selection of the specific purposes to his executor or some other person (b), or has left a blank in his will for the name or description of the specific charitable institution or purpose to which he intends it to be devoted (c), or has otherwise failed to indicate definitely the exact way in which he wishes the money to be applied (d). Nor is a charitable bequest void for uncertainty merely because the body of persons for whose benefit it is given is large and fluctuating (e), or because it gives the testator's trustees a wide power of selection (f). So if a testator bequeaths a legacy to a charitable institution which has never existed, this is primâ facie a good charitable bequest (g). And if a testator bequeaths a legacy to a charity by a name or description which is common to two or more institutions, and it cannot be ascertained which was the intended object, the legacy will be divided between them, or administered cy-près in some other manner (h). But where a testator bequeathed to each of the inmates for the time being of "the several hospitals of or in the vicinity of Canterbury" a certain yearly sum, it was held that the bequest was void for uncertainty, principally on the ground that the amount of the fund to be appropriated to answer the bequest could not be determined (hh).

Where the gift is incompletely expressed (as "to the P. A. Society or some one or more kindred institutions") the Court will settle a scheme for its application (i).

If, however, the executors or trustees of a will have an absolute discretion of selecting the charitable objects and purposes to which the testator's property is to be applied, the Court will not, it seems, in the absence of special circumstances, require a scheme, but will leave the application of the property to the trustees (ii).

It will be remembered that where a testator makes a bequest to a charitable society, and gives it a power of application sufficiently wide to cover non-charitable objects, the Court will not infer a general charitable intention from the mere fact that the society is a charitable one (j).

If a testator gives a legacy to a charity by a particular name or description, and it is found that there is no institution exactly answering the description, and that there are two or more institutions to which the description partially applies, parol evidence is admissible to shew the locality and nature of the rival institutions, and the connection between the testator and one or both of them (k); for example, it may be proved that the testator during his life subscribed to one of the institutions (l).

In Lee v. Pain (m), the testatrix by a codicil bequeathed a legacy of 100*l.* to "Highbury College" and 500*l.* to "the Hoxton Academy." There had formerly been an institution called the Hoxton Academy, but ten years before the date of the codicil it had been removed to

CHAPTER IX.

Highbury and was thenceforward called Highbury College ; consequently if the testatrix had simply bequeathed 500*l.* to the Hoxton Academy the Court would probably have held Highbury College entitled to it, but such a construction was excluded by the bequest of 100*l.* to Highbury College. It is true that the principle of this decision was disregarded in Re Maguire (n), where a testatrix bequeathed a legacy of 200*l.* to the I. A. C. S. and 200*l.* to the I. C. P. S., both charitable institutions ; at the date of the will there was an I. A. C. S., but shortly before the testatrix's death it changed its name to the I. S. A. S. ; there had never been any such society as the I. C. P. S., but the I. S. A. S. had objects similar to those which would have been carried out by the I. C. P. S. if it had existed for the purposes indicated by the name ; it was held that the I. S. A. S. was entitled to both legacies, but the Attorney-General did not object, and the point decided in Lee v. Pain does not seem to have been argued.

Where two societies unite.

In Re Joy (o) the testatrix bequeathed a legacy of 200*l.* each to two societies which amalgamated after the date of the will : it was held that the united society was entitled to 400*l.*

Gift partly good and partly bad.

If a testator bequeaths a fund for two definite purposes, one of which is illegal and the other charitable, the question arises how far the latter purpose can be carried into effect. According to some of the authorities, it seems that if the illegal purpose is the primary purpose, the surplus only being given to charity, and the primary purpose is of such a nature that the amount required to carry it out cannot be ascertained, the result is that the surplus cannot be ascertained and the whole gift fails (p). But if the primary purpose is of such a definite nature that the testator must have intended the charity to take a substantial sum by way of surplus, then the effect of the failure of the primary purpose is that the charity takes the whole. A common instance of this kind of gift is where a testator gives a fund upon trust to apply the income in the first place in maintaining a tomb, and to apply the surplus to some charitable purpose (q).

Brown* had been restricted by the decision of the House of Lords in Magistrates of Dundee v. Morris (3 Macq. 134). But in Re Birkett (9 Ch. D. 576), Jessel, M.R., thought were three primary objects, one of which was illegal, and it was held that one-third of the fund fell into the residue, and that the charity to which the surplus was given took the income arising from the other two-thirds after satisfying the two legal primary purposes.

If, however, the testator has given a fund for two purposes pari passu, one of them being illegal and the other charitable, the Court will endeavour to ascertain what portion of the fund would be sufficient to satisfy the illegal purpose if it were legal; this part of the gift fails, and the charity only takes the balance of the fund (s). If it is impossible to make the calculation, the Court will divide the fund between the two purposes (t).

The Court does not take upon itself to frame schemes for the disposal of money for any other than charitable purposes. All moneys, therefore, not bequeathed in charity must have some definite object, or must devolve as undisposed of (u), except in cases where it may be held that the trustee takes absolutely. The general consideration of such gifts will be reserved for a subsequent chapter, as more properly falling under the head of gifts void for uncertainty; but it must be here noticed, that where the bequest is for charitable purposes, and also for purposes of an indefinite nature not charitable, and no apportionment of the bequest is made by the will, so that the whole might be applied for either purpose, the whole bequest is void (v). A distinction not now recognised was indeed formerly taken, that such a bequest was good, if there were trustees named, to whose discretion the testator had committed the carrying out of his intentions, and with whom, therefore, the Court would not interfere (w). Such a distinction will be found inconsistent with the decisions presently noticed; and it seems now established, that the Court will only recognise the validity of trusts which it can either itself execute, or can control when in process of being executed by trustees (x).

Thus, in Vezey v. Jamson (y), where a testator gave the residue of his estate to his executors, upon trust to apply and dispose of the same in or towards such charitable uses or purposes, person or persons, or otherwise, as he might by any codicil, or by memorandum in his own handwriting, appoint, and as the laws of the land would admit of; and, in default, upon trust to pay and apply the same in or towards such charitable or public purposes, as the laws of the land would admit of; or to any person or persons, and in such shares, manner, and form as his (the testator's) executors, or the survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, should in their or his discretion, will, and pleasure, think fit, or as they should think would have been agreeable to him, if living, and as the laws of the land did not prohibit: Sir J. Leach, V.-C., observed, that the testator had not fixed upon any part of the property a trust for a charitable use, and the Court could not, therefore, devote any part of it to charity; he had given it to the trustees expressly upon trust, and they could not, therefore, hold it for their own benefit; the purposes of the trust being so general and undefined, they must fail altogether, and the next-of-kin become entitled.

And in Kendall v. Granger (z), where the trustees were directed to dispose of the residue for the relief of domestic distress, assisting indigent but deserving individuals, or encouraging undertakings of general utility, in such mode and proportions as their own discretion might suggest, irresponsible to any person or persons whatsoever; Lord Langdale, M. R., decided that the gift was void for uncertainty. He said that to make the bequest valid, it must be obligatory on the trustees to apply the whole (a) of it in charity; it was not a question whether the trustees might apply the fund to a charitable purpose, but whether by the words of the will they were bound to do so. To make the bequest valid it must be obligatory on them.

The principle laid down in the foregoing cases was the subject of much difference of judicial opinion in the recent case of Hunter v. Att.-Gen. (b). The House of Lords finally decided that the terms of the gift, if it had been valid, would have authorised the trustees to expend the whole fund for a purpose not charitable (namely the purchase of advowsons), and that consequently there was no general trust for charity and the whole gift failed.

Such being the rule, the terms of the trust will first be closely examined to see whether, though not the most correct or most appropriate for describing only a charitable object, they ought not in fair construction to be so confined. Thus, in Dolan v. Macdermot (c), where the trust was to lay out "in such charities and other public purposes as lawfully might be in the parish of T.," as the trustees should think proper, it was held that the words referring to the parish of T. prevented the gift from being uncertain, and that the words "other public purposes" meant purposes ejusdem generis, i.e., charitable, and that they were used only as filling up a description of purposes which, although charitable within the statute of Elizabeth, (and in that sense included in "charities"), were not within the popular meaning of the word "charities," and therefore the whole gift shewed an intention to create a charity for the benefit of the parish.

Charity held the sole purpose, notwithstanding doubtful expression.

Again, in Pocock v. Att.-Gen. (d), where a testator, after giving several charitable legacies out of a particular fund, directed the residue of it "to be given by his executors to such charitable institutions as he should by any future codicil give the same, and in default of any such gift, then to be distributed by his executors at their discretion"; the testator made no further codicil, and it was held that the direction in favour of charity ran through the whole sentence: that the testator intended to choose the charitable institutions himself, but that if he failed to do so his executors were to choose them.

On the same principle, a bequest of a sum to "be given in charitable and deserving objects," or "for charitable and benevolent institutions," or "for religious and benevolent societies or objects" is a good charitable gift (e). And a gift "for such missionary objects

Verril, Amb. 585, n., is therefore good law notwithstanding Lord Cottenham's disapproval of it in Ellis v. Selby, 1 My. & Cr. 292. See also Wilkinson v. Lindgren, L. R. 5 Ch. 570, where the gift was to certain specified charitable institutions "or to any other religious institutions or purposes" as the trustees might think proper; and it was held that the word "religious" must be carried on so as to apply to the "purposes," and that the gift was good. So a gift for charities, as M. shall select," if M. is known to the testator to be engaged in a particular kind of missionary work, is not void for uncertainty (f).

And if a testator makes a bequest to A. "for the charitable purposes agreed on between us," evidence is admissible to shew what those purposes were (g).

Distinction where the gift is for charitable and other ascertained objects, though apportionment left to trustees.

The foregoing cases, where the gifts were held void for uncertainty, must be distinguished from those where the bequest is for a charitable purpose, and for another ascertained object; for here even though the amount to be devoted to each object be not specified, and the apportionment be left to the discretion of trustees, yet the trust is such that the Court can control the execution of it so far as to see that the trustees appropriate no part of the benefit to themselves; whereas in the former cases the non-charitable object, (which may absorb the whole,) is so indefinite as to be wholly beyond the control of the Court; and to hold that such a gift is valid, would be in effect to hold the trustees entitled for their own benefit.

Trustees declining to apportion, donees take equally.

The objects among whom the trustees are to apportion the testator's bounty being sufficiently definite, are not to be disappointed by the trustees refusing to exercise their power or dying before doing so. In such event, the Court will divide the fund equally among the several objects, upon the principle that equality is equity.

Thus, in Att.-Gen. v. Doyley (h), where a testator directed his trustees and the survivor, and the heirs of such survivor, to dispose of his property to such of his relations of his mother's side as were most deserving, and for such charitable purposes as they should also think most proper: one of the trustees declined to act, and Sir J. Jekyll, M. R., directed that one-half of the property should go to the testator's relatives on the mother's side, and the other half to charitable uses.

So, in Salisbury v. Denton (i), where a testator bequeathed a fund to be at the disposal of his widow by her will, therewith to apply a part to the foundation of a charity school or such other charitable endowment for the poor of O. as she might prefer, and under such restrictions as she might prescribe, and the remainder to be at her disposal among the testator's relatives as she might direct: the widow having died without exercising her power of apportioning the fund, it was held by Sir W. P. Wood, V.-C., that the gift was not void, but that the Court would divide the fund in equal moieties.

In Adnam v. Cole (j), where a testator bequeathed the residue of his personal estate (consisting partly of leasehold property) to trustees upon trust to lay out the same in building such a monument to his memory as they should think fit, and in building an organ gallery in the parish church, it was held by Lord Langdale, M. R., that the trustees had not rightly exercised their discretion in applying the whole to the monument, and he referred it to the Master to ascertain in what proportion the residue ought to be divided between the two objects.

This case, it will be observed, differs from the preceding, in the mode of division adopted by the Court; the specific nature of the objects enabling the Court to apportion the fund between them without resorting to the expedient of cutting the knot by equal division. But the case is equally an authority against holding the bequest void for uncertainty (k).

And if, instead of a trust for a charitable and another definite object, there be a trust for a charitable or another definite object, as trustees shall appoint, there would be an implied trust for both in default of appointment (l).

In Down v. Worrall (m), where the trust was for charitable or pious (n) uses at the discretion of the trustees or otherwise for the benefit of the testator's sister and her children; one of the trustees died while part of the fund was still unappointed, and Sir J. Leach, M. R., held that the unappointed part was undisposed of and belonged to the next-of-kin. The decision seems to be inconsistent with the authorities, and is generally considered incorrect (o).

(k) In like manner, if there are several charitable objects, and the share of each is undefined, the Court will direct inquiries to ascertain the proportion due to each: Re Rigley's Trust, 36 L. J. Ch. 147; Champney v. Davy, 11 Ch. D. 949; compare Hoare v. Osborne, L. R., 1 Eq. 585, supra

(m) 1 My. & K. 561.

(n) A "pious" use is not necessarily a charitable use, but may be made so by the context: Heath v. Chapman, 2 Drew. 417.

CHAPTER IX.

and money charged on or arising out of land, as explained in a subsequent part of this chapter, "a man may dispose of his whole personal estate (p) to charitable purposes capable of enduring for ever, in despite of the claims of his nearest kindred; and dispositions so made are strongly favoured in point of construction (q); for by a rule peculiar to gifts of this nature, if the donor declare his intention in favour of charity indefinitely, without any specification of objects, or in favour of defined objects, which happen to fail, from whatever cause; although, in such cases, the particular mode of application contemplated by the testator is uncertain or impracticable, yet the general purpose being charity, such purpose will, notwithstanding the indefiniteness or failure of its immediate objects, be carried into effect" (r). Thus, in the case of a gift to the poor in general (s), or to charitable uses generally (t), or for the advancement of religion, expressed in the most vague and indefinite terms (u); or to such charitable uses as the testator's executor shall appoint, and the testator revokes the appointment of the executor (v); or the executor renounces probate (in which case he cannot claim to exercise his discretion) (w); or to such charitable uses as A. shall appoint, and A. dies in the lifetime of the testator (x), or neglects or refuses to appoint (y); or to such charitable uses as the testator himself shall appoint or has appointed, and he dies without making an appointment (z), or the instrument of appointment cannot be found (a), or where the testator makes a disposition in favour of an object which has no existence (b), or for a purpose which has become impossible (d); or unnecessary (e); or cannot legally be carried out in the manner directed by the testator (f); or bequeaths to the trustees of a charity who refuse to accept (g); or to a particular charity by a description equally applicable to more than one (and it is wholly uncertain which was intended (h)); or having evinced his intention to give certain property in charity, only disposes of part of it in favour of certain named charitable purposes (i), or leaves blanks in his will for the names of the charities and the proportion to be allotted to each (j); in these and all such cases, though the bequest would, upon the ordinary principles which govern the construction of testamentary dispositions, be wholly or partly void for uncertainty, yet the purpose being charity, the Crown as parens patriæ, or the Court of Chancery, will execute it cy-près (k).

Foreign charities are an exception to the general rule, for as the court has no jurisdiction to administer a foreign charity, it cannot execute the trust cy-près. Consequently if the persons who are appointed by the testator to administer the charity abroad, disclaim or refuse to accept the trusts, the gift fails (kk).

Exception in the case of a foreign charity.

The rule is not displaced or superseded by a residuary bequest to other charitable uses contained in the same will. The legacy does not fall into the residue; for the doctrine is that it fails in the mode only and not in substance; and cy-près means the nearest to that which has so failed, not the nearest to the testator's other charitable purposes (l). But if the testator expressly provides that, in case the particular mode of application directed by him should fail, the legacy shall fall into the residue, it should seem that the rule is excluded (m). For however exceptional, it is a rule of construction, and must yield to a contrary intention (n).

But not if contrary intention appears by the will.

Gift to particular charity.

Such contrary intention may be collected by construction from the very terms of the gift; which may so clearly define the particular object of gift as to render the testator's intention incapable of execution otherwise than in the mode pointed out by the will. The mode is then of the substance, and if it cannot be pursued the legacy will fail altogether. Thus in Att.-Gen. v. Bishop of Oxford (o) the bequest was "to build a church at W. where the chapel now is"; the bishop (who was patron and parson) would not let it be built there, and the churchwardens suggested that "the old chapel should be repaired, the living augmented, &c.," while the next-of-kin insisted that a new church must be built and the surplus divided among them: but Lord Kenyon observed that if the bishop objected he could not interfere; that as to repairing, &c., he could not do that; the intention must be implicitly followed, or nothing could be done. So in Corbyn v. French (p) the legacy was to the trustees of a chapel to discharge a mortgage thereon: the mortgage had been already paid off; and Lord Alvanley held the legacy void by the stat. 9 Geo. 2, c. 36; but he also held that if it had not been so, it would have been void because the object intended could not be effected, and there was no ground to apply it to any other purpose (q).

On the same principle, where a testator bequeathed money to maintain an almshouse on a particular piece of land, and the trust could not be carried out because the almshouse was not in Wilkes, 72 L. T. 323, there were some general words which seem to have prevented the total failure of the bequest. If property is given to charity in an uncertain future event, there is a resulting trust in the meanwhile: Att.-Gen. v. Craven, 21 Bea. 392. As to the Rule against Perpetuities, see ante, p. 211.

(p) 4 Ves. 431.

(q) Re White's Trusts, 33 Ch. D. 449, seems to have been decided on this principle, though the V.-C. (Baon) said that the case was "purely and distinctly that of a lapsed legacy." A similar question arose in Sinnett v. Herbert, L. R. 7 Ch. 232, but was not decided.

mortmain, it was held that the bequest could not be administered cy-près (r).

CHAPTER IX.

But if a testator bequeaths a sum of money to establish a charity, involving the future acquisition of land (the land to be provided from some other source), the Court will inquire whether the necessary land will be acquired within a reasonable time, and, if not, the legacy will be administered cy-près, provided the testator shews a general intention in favour of charity (s).

Where land required cannot be obtained, fund may be administered cy-près.

In Att.-Gen. v. Bushby (t), a testator in 1494 devised property to be applied for ever in the discharge of the tax of the commonalty of a certain town to King Henry VII. and his successors; it was not known what was meant by the tax referred to, and the freemen of the town had long been in the habit of applying the income for their own benefit; in 1857 the Court directed a scheme to be prepared for the application of the income for the benefit of the town or its inhabitants generally. In this case it is clear that the property had been dedicated to charitable purposes by lapse of time, but if in a similar case the question were raised on the death of the testator, it may be that the specific purpose for which the property was given would be held to have failed.

Lapse of time.

If a testator bequeaths a fund, the income of which is to be applied in repairing a road, and the duty of repairing it is afterwards by statute imposed on a local authority, the authority is entitled to be paid the income (u).

The principle laid down in Att.-Gen. v. Bishop of Oxford was followed in Cherry v. Mott (v), where a testator desired that, if his personal estate should be sufficient for the purpose, a presentation to Christ's Hospital should be bought for the son of a freeman of H.; the personal estate proved insufficient. Sir C. Pepys, M. R., said: "This legacy is conditional. There is no gift if the personal estate be not sufficient to fulfil the contract." He added, "Another objection is that this is a gift for a particular purpose which cannot take effect by reason of the refusal of the governors, and that it

So in Re Mann ([1903] 1 Ch. 232) a testatrix bequeathed a sum for the benefit of "M. Institute," which was a private building used for purposes beneficial to the inhabitants of the locality, but not dedicated to charity: it was held that the legacy must be administered under the direction of the Court. therefore fails altogether." After citing Att.-Gen. v. Bishop of Oxford, and Lord Alvanley's view of the doctrine, he referred to the more extended sense in which it was understood by Lord Eldon, and concluded, "In this case, however, there is no gift except in the direction to do that which cannot be effected. It is not within the principle of those cases in which the Court executes a general purpose cy-près, the particular mode being impossible" (w).

This case has been referred to as standing on special ground as a conditional legacy. But as the condition required only that the estate should suffice for the particular mode, the appellation of "conditional" appears not to mark any difference in kind, but only the cogency of the terms to indicate that the mode was of the substance of the gift (x).

Partial exclusion of the cy-près doctrine.

Lord Alvanley said he thought the legacy in Corbyn v. French (supposing it not illegal), as well as the legacy in Att.-Gen. v. Bishop of Oxford, might each have been applied in repairing the particular building, though not for any other purpose (y). But partial exclusion of the rule is scarcely less significant than total exclusion. For the rule is that where the substantial intention is charity, but the particular mode cannot be carried into effect, the Court (or the Crown) supplies another mode (z): which other mode need not bear any absolute resemblance to that intended by the testator; only it must first be ascertained that none can be found nearer to it (a). Thus a trust for redemption of British slaves in Barbary having, after a long continuance, failed for want of objects, was executed by Lord Cottenham in favour of charity schools in England and Wales (b). This must be borne in mind in considering the cases that remain to be noticed.

Cy-près does not imply an absolute resemblance.

Cases of "lapse."

In Clark v. Taylor (c), a legacy was bequeathed "to the treasurer of the Female Orphan School at G., patronised by Mrs. E., for the benefit of that charity"; the school had been established and maintained by Mrs. E. at her own expense, without treasurer or other official, and seems to have come to an end about the same time that the testator died (d). Kindersley, V.-C., said there was a recognised distinction between a gift showing a general charitable purpose, and pointing out the mode in which it was to be carried into effect, and a gift to a particular institution; that here the institution being a mere private school maintained by the beneficence of Mrs. E., he could not say the legacy was to go to any other institution. But this decision has been questioned, and, according to the later authorities, it clearly cannot be supported unless it went on the ground that the school had come to an end before the testator's death, so that the legacy lapsed.

In Russell v. Kellett (e), a legacy of fixed amount was given to each of a number of poor persons answering a certain description; some of them survived the testatrix, but died before payment, and it was held by Stuart, V.-C., that their legacies lapsed. He said the doctrine of cy-près meant that some other object could be found in a reasonable degree nearly answering the object mentioned by the testatrix, but that here was such a singular and particular definition of the objects as made it impossible to find any other so nearly resembling them as to justify the application of the doctrine. The will also gave the residue of the property to the legatees in proportion to their legacies, and it was held that only those living at the time of distribution could take. The case was a peculiar one, and is probably not valuable as an authority on the general principle (f).

Kellett.*

In Marsh v. Means (g), a testator gave a legacy, payable after the death of his wife, for continuing a certain publication (which had been published by the Association for Promoting Humanity to Animals) according to principles stated in one of its numbers, viz. to expose cruelty to animals, to diffuse moral and religious information, &c. At the date of the will the publication had been discontinued, and the association itself was extinct; and it was held by Wood, V.-C., that this was not a bequest for promoting these principles, but for continuing the publication of this particular book, which brought the case within Clark v. Taylor, so that the doctrine of cy-près was not applicable, and the gift lapsed by extinction of the object.

Att.-Gen.

Again, in Fisk v. Att.-Gen. (h), where a legacy was given "to the Ladies' Benevolent Society at L. as part of its ordinary funds," and before the testator's death the society ceased to exist, Wood, V.-C., said it has been expressly decided by Clark v. Taylor and Russell v. Kellett, that when a gift was made by will to a charity which had expired, it was as much a lapse as a gift to an individual who had expired; and that though the point might some day require further consideration, he could not interfere with the settled authorities.

Clark v. Taylor and Fisk v. Att.-Gen. were followed by Pearson, J., in Re Ovey (i), and by the Court of Appeal in Re Rymer (j), where the authorities were discussed at length.

The question sometimes arises as to the degree of failure or cesser of a charitable institution which will constitute a lapse. Thus, in Re Waring (k), a testatrix bequeathed a legacy to the "St. A. School," which, at the date of the will, was carried on under a trust deed as a Church of England school under the management of the vicar of the parish; before the death of the testatrix the school ceased to be carried on during the week in accordance with the trust deed, but was used on Sundays as a Sunday school: it was held by Kekewich, J., that the legacy had not lapsed.

Cases where
lapse is

If the bequest is to a named institution merely as the instrument for executing the testator's charitable intent, which he fully describes, the failure of the institution will not involve the failure of the charitable trust (kk).

It is also clear that, where the charitable object fails after the testator's death, and before the legacy has been paid, the gift will not lapse. In Hayter v. Trego (l), where the bequest was to "the D. Asylum for Female Penitents," which was dissolved after the testator's death, it was assumed that the legacy was to be applied cy-près, the only question argued being whether this should be done by the Crown or by the Court. And in Re Slevin (m), it was held that a charitable bequest to an institution which ceases to exist after the testator's death, and before the legacy has been paid, does not lapse so as to let in the residuary legatee, but will be applied by the Crown for some analogous purpose of charity, irrespective of whether or not any general charitable intention that the fund shall be administered cy-près is indicated by the will, on the ground that, as the charity existed at the testator's death, the legacy became the property of that charity.

(m) [1891] 2 Ch. 236, reversing the decision of Stirling, J., [1891] 1 Ch. 373. Compare the cases cited supra p. 235, n. (d), in some of which the

The case of Marsh v. Means, above cited, was not an ordinary case of lapse, because the object of the gift had ceased to exist before the date of the will. Probably the decision turned on the specific nature of the gift, and if it had been expressed in more general terms effect might have been given to it. Thus in Coldwell v. Holme (mm), a testatrix bequeathed 200*l.* to "The Benevolent Institution for X." (describing the charitable objects of the institution), an institution which had existed, but had ceased to exist at the date of the will; there was, however, at the date of the will an old-established society called "The Royal M. Society for X.," and it was held that this society was entitled to the legacy. Possibly the same result might have been reached by applying the doctrine of cy-près.

In Re Buck (n), a legacy was bequeathed to a friendly society which was established to provide annuities for its members and their widows and children, if in distressed circumstances; the legacy was not required, because the funds of the society were sufficient to provide for the surviving annuitants: it was held that the legacy had not lapsed and was applicable cy-près.

If there is a gift to a charitable institution by name, and no such institution can be found to have existed, this does not necessarily prevent the legacy from being successfully claimed by another institution, similar in name or in object to the non-existent institution (o). If, however, there is no institution which can establish its claim, it will generally be presumed that the testator, in naming the institution, merely intended to indicate the purpose to which he wished the legacy applied, for it is clear he could not have intended to benefit a particular institution, and the legacy will be applied cy-près (p).

Where institution never existed.

CHAPTER IX.

Where there are several charities equally answering the description.

It sometimes happens that a legacy is given to a particular institution by a description equally applicable to more than one. It cannot here be presumed that the testator did not intend to select one in particular; for he may have known, and, considering the terms of the bequest, probably did know, only one answering the description; yet, as it cannot be ascertained which, the particular purpose fails; nevertheless it is clear that the legacy will be applied cy-près, or divided between the two institutions (r).

Cherry v. Mott (s) shows that there may be a conditional legacy to a charity as well as for any other purpose, and that if the condition is not fulfilled the legacy fails in substance. And if the condition is such that it need not be performed within the limits allowed by the Rule against Perpetuities, the gift is void (t). Such cases must be distinguished from those where the intention is to give a fund to charity at once, though there may be an indefinite suspense or abeyance in its actual application. If the particular purposes may be answered, though not immediately, the fund will be retained—how long does not clearly appear: but if those purposes turn out on inquiry to be impracticable, then the fund will be applied cy-près. And during such retention there is no resulting trust for heir or next-of-kin (u).

It has been already mentioned that where a testator shews an intention to devote certain property to charitable purposes, and fails to specify all or some of them, the property so undisposed of will be applied cy-près (v). It is also explained in a subsequent chapter (w) that gifts to charity are an exception to the doctrine of resulting trusts in this respect, that where property is given to a charity and the income afterwards increases, so that there is a surplus after satisfying the purposes for which it was given, this surplus is also, as a general rule, applicable cy-près.

Cases within the Mortmain Acts.

It remains to be noticed, that the cy-près doctrine does not apply to bequests which are made void by the Mortmain Act of 1736 or 1888, and therefore a bequest of money to be laid out in land is not executed cy-près, i.e., applied to an allowed charitable purpose.

But an express gift over, in case the charitable gift cannot by law take effect, is valid (x).

CHAPTER IX.

The reason preventing a gift which is void under the Mortmain Act from being applied cy-près, namely that it is made void by the statute, also applies to other gifts for purposes which are expressly forbidden (y). And a similar rule applies to a bequest, if the purposes for which it is made are illegal because they are contrary to the policy of the law : such a gift cannot be applied cy-près, although the intention of the testator is to benefit (according to his ideas) a certain section of the public. On this principle bequests for promoting doctrines inconsistent with Christianity, or morality, or with the fundamental doctrines of the British constitution, or for purchasing the discharge of persons imprisoned for poaching, have been held void (z). But where the reason why a bequest cannot be applied in a particular way is that, although not expressly forbidden, it nevertheless contravenes the policy of a statute, then if the main object of the bequest is charitable and is sufficiently general it will be applied cy-près. Thus in Da Costa v. De Pas (a), a bequest for instructing people in the Jewish religion was held to be contrary to the law relating to the Established Church, and was applied cy-près. So in Cary v. Abbot (b), a bequest for bringing up poor orphan children in the Roman Catholic faith was held to be void only in the manner and not in the substance, and was applied cy-près. Such bequests would, at the present day, be held to be legal in all respects (c). In Att.-Gen. v. Vint (d), a bequest for providing the inmates of a workhouse with fermented liquor was directed to be administered cy-près, in such a way as not to contravene the provisions of the law relating to workhouses. But if the testator has no general charitable intention and has only a particular object in view, which is illegal, then the bequest fails altogether (e).

The general law of charities is beyond the scope of this treatise, but it may be mentioned that with respect to the particular cases in which the Crown, and those in which the Court, undertakes the office of administering charities, the distinction seems to be, that where the bequest is by the intervention of trustees, even though those trustees die in the testator's lifetime or refuse to act, it devolves upon the Court (f); but where the object is charity without a trust interposed, the direction must be by the sign manual of the Sovereign (g). Accordingly, in Re Pyne (h), where the testatrix gave her residuary estate to trustees in trust for such charitable purposes as she might thereafter specify by codicil, and she failed to do so, it was held that the Court had jurisdiction to direct a scheme. In a case (i) where there was a bequest to a voluntary charitable society, which existed when the will was made, and also at the death of the testator, but was dissolved before his assets could be administered, it was held that the execution devolved on the Court.

But this decision seems to have proceeded partly on the ground that the testator shewed a general charitable intention; and in Re Slevin (j), where there was a legacy to a charitable institution which was in existence at the death of the testator, but ceased to exist before legacy was paid, it was held that the legacy fell to be administered by the Crown.

Both the Crown and the Court, however, in the exercise of their discretion, alike act upon the principle of adhering as closely as possible to the spirit of the donor's expressed or presumed intention (k).

Where the testator's object is sufficiently defined, and is capable of being carried into effect, it will not be departed from upon a notion of more extended utility (l).

In Wallis v. Sol.-Gen. for New Zealand (e), the question was raised whether, if a charity instituted by a Crown grant to trustees becomes impossible of performance, the Court has jurisdiction to administer it cy-près, but in the view of the case taken by the Judicial Committee, the point became immaterial (f).

Where a pecuniary legacy is bequeathed absolutely to a person, to be applied for such charitable purposes as he may in his discretion select, or is bequeathed absolutely to a corporation existing for only charitable purposes, the Court will direct payment, without requiring that a scheme be settled by itself for its appropriation (g). And the same rule obtains where a legacy is given to the treasurer or other officer of a charitable institution, though not a corporation, to become part of the general funds of that institution (h). But where the legacy is to be applied, not as part of the general funds of the institution, but for certain permanent charitable trusts, which the testator has pointed out, the Court will take upon itself to insure the accomplishment of the testator's object by a scheme of its own (i).

And if a legacy is bequeathed for a charitable purpose, subject to a continuing condition, the fund may be retained in court and the income paid out so long as the condition is complied with (ii).

Continuing condition.

Where a legacy is given to a foreign charity, the Court will direct it to be paid to the persons appointed by the testator to receive it, and will not take upon itself to administer the fund (j). Nevertheless the Court has jurisdiction to secure a legacy given for charitable purposes by a subject of the Crown, whether in or out of this country, and will sometimes order the fund to be carried to a separate account in Court, and the income only paid over to the person named in the will, subject to an account of the mode of its application (k). And if a fund is given to English trustees to be retained and invested in this country, for the benefit of a foreign charity, the Court has jurisdiction (which it will exercise in a proper case) to settle a scheme (l).

(f) Their lordships held that the donors were certain Maori chiefs. The Court of Appeal in New Zealand thought that the Crown was the grantor, as the natives had merely a right of occupation, and not a legal title which they could transfer to anyone else; this seems the correct view (see [1901] A. C. p. 567). The Court of Appeal also thought that, according to the law of New Zealand, the Crown, as parens patriæ, has the duty not only of enforcing charitable trusts, but also of protecting the rights of the natives in respect of land occupied by them, and that where these two duties conflict, the Court may have a difficulty in applying the doctrine of cy-près. The Judicial Committee failed to appreciate this point.

As already explained, the Court will not apply the cy-près doctrine to a foreign charity, unless the trustees are within the jurisdiction (m).

Charity
Commissioners.

It will, of course, be remembered that under the Charitable Trusts Acts, 1853 to 1894, the Charity Commissioners, and in some cases the Board of Education, have power to frame schemes for the application or management of endowed charities (n). Such schemes ought to be framed in accordance with the doctrine of cy-près, and if any scheme is framed on a wrong principle the Court will vary it (nn).

Policy of early times in regard to charity.

VI. The Mortmain Acts of 1736 and 1888 (o).—"The policy of early times," says Mr. Jarman (p), "strongly favoured gifts, even of land, to charitable purposes. Thus, not only was no restraint imposed on such dispositions by the early statutes of wills, but the act of 43 Eliz. c. 4 (q), as construed by the Courts, tended greatly to facilitate gifts of this nature, such act having been held to authorise testamentary appointments to corporations for charitable uses (r), and even to enlarge the devising capacity of testators, by rendering valid devises to those uses by a tenant in tail (s); and also by a copyholder, without a previous surrender to the use of the will (t), though it was admitted that the statute did not extend to the removal of personal disabilities, such as infancy, lunacy, and the like (u).

“To the same policy we may ascribe that rule of construction, presently considered, by the effect of which property once devoted to charity was never allowed to be diverted into any other channel, by the failure or uncertainty of the particular objects. At the commencement of the eighteenth century, however, the tide of public opinion appears to have flowed in an opposite direction, and the legislature deemed it necessary to impose further restrictions on gifts to charitable objects; from the nature of which it may be presumed that the practice of disposing by will of lands to charity had antecedently prevailed to such an extent as to threaten public inconvenience. It appears to have been considered, that this disposition would be sufficiently counteracted by preventing persons from aliening more of their lands than they chose to part with in their own lifetime; the supposition evidently being, that men were in little danger of being perniciously generous at the sacrifice of their own personal enjoyment, and when uninfluenced by the near prospect of death.” Accordingly, the stat. of 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, (usually called the Statute of Mortmain,) after referring in the preamble to the public mischief caused by improvident alienations or dispositions made by languishing or dying persons or by other persons to charitable uses to take place after their deaths, to the disherison of their lawful heirs (v), enacted, that from and after 24th June, 1736, no hereditaments, or personal estate to be laid out in the purchase of hereditaments, should be given, conveyed, or settled to or upon any persons, bodies politic or corporate, or otherwise, for any estate or interest whatsoever, or any ways charged or incumbered, in trust or for the benefit of any charitable uses whatsoever, unless such gift or settlement of hereditaments or personal estate (other than stocks in the public funds) be made by deed indented (w), sealed and delivered in the presence of two credible witnesses (x), twelve calendar months before the death of the donor, including the days of the execution and death, and enrolled (y) in

No hereditaments, or personal estate to be laid out in the purchase of hereditaments, to be disposed of or charged for any charitable use, other than by indenture enrolled in Chancery, &c.

This recital is therefore of much importance in construing the rest of the statute”: per Blackburn, J., 8 H. L. C. p. 624. It is hardly necessary to say that this preamble does not appear in the act of 1888, being inconsistent with modern ideas of parliamentary drafting. But it is still referred to by the Courts, notwithstanding its repeal. See per Stirling, J., [1895] 1 Ch. p. 425, and the

The second section provided, that purchases for valuable consideration should not be avoided by the death of the grantor within the twelve months, leaving, however, such purchases subject to the other conditions imposed by the act (b). Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888.

This act was repealed, except so much of section 5 thereof (d) as had not been repealed, but the provisions of the first three sections thereof as modified by later acts (e) were in effect re-enacted by the fourth section of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888 (f). That section, so far as material for the present purpose, enacted as follows :—" (1.) Subject to the savings and exceptions contained in this act, every assurance of land to or for the benefit of any charitable uses, and every assurance of personal estate to be laid out in the purchase of land to or for the benefit of any charitable uses, shall be made in accordance with the requirements of this act, and unless so made shall be void." The assurance must (2) take effect in possession; and must, (3), except as provided by sub-ss. (4), (5), be without any power of revocation, reservation, &c., for the benefit of the assurator, or of any person claiming under him. (6.) If the assurance was of land, not being land of copyhold charity land already in mortmain does not require enrolment, Ashton v. Jones, 28 Beav. 460.

A lease for years to take effect in possession within one year is good, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 106.

(a) This does not preclude the donor from reserving to himself a power of regulating the charity, 2 Cox, 301. See also 1 Mer. 327. And certain restrictive covenants and other provisions are now permissible, see 24 Vict. c. 9, s. 1; 51 & 52 Vict. c. 42, s. 4 (4, 5).

or customary tenure, or was of personal estate, not being stock in the public funds, it must be made by deed executed in the presence of at least two witnesses. (7.) Such assurance, unless made in good faith for valuable consideration, must be made at least twelve months before the death of the assurator; and (9) the assurance, or, if the uses of land were declared by a separate instrument, then that instrument, must be enrolled in the Central Office of the Supreme Court within six months after the making of the assurance. (8.) An assurance of stock in the public funds, unless made in good faith, &c., must be made by transfer at least six months before the death of the assurator.

By section 10, unless the context otherwise required, the term "assurance" included devise, bequest and every other assurance by will or codicil, and "land" included tenements and hereditaments, corporeal and incorporeal, of whatsoever tenure, and any estate or interest in land (g).

The effect of these two statutes was to render absolutely void every testamentary gift of land, or of any interest in land, or of money arising from (h), or charged on, or connected with land (i), and every bequest of personalty to be laid out in land for charitable purposes; with the effect that any such property so devised or bequeathed went to the heir or next-of-kin, or to the residuary devisee or legatee, as the case might be (j). The operation of the acts is confined to land in England (k).

So far as regards the wills of testators dying after the 5th August, 1891, the fourth section of the Mortmain, &c., Act, of 1888 has been in effect repealed by the Mortmain, &c., Act of 1891, referred to in the next section, and land, and all

(g) This definition is repealed as regards the wills of testators dying after 5th August, 1891, by the M. & C. U. Act, 1891, below, p. 274.

(h) Post, p. 250.

(i) A voluntary covenant to pay a sum to a charity after covenantor's death is void under this act, so far as it would affect chattel real assets, Jeffries v. Alexander, 8 H. L. Ca. 594, and see s. c. as to validity of "devices to evade the statute," and as to the object of the act; and Fox v. Lownds, L. R., 19 Eq. 453. But where a settlor covenanted to pay a sum to trustees of a deed whereby a power of testamentary appointment was given to his wife; the wife by her will appointed part of the sum to charitable uses; the settlor survived the wife, and died without having paid the sum; his estate consisted partly of impure personalty: it was held that the sum being a mere debt from the settlor's estate, the charitable gift was not in any part void under the Mortmain Act, Re Robson, 19 Ch. D. 156. As to subscription funds, and as to parol declarations of trust, see Girdlestone v. Creed, 10 Hare, 480.

(j) There is, however, a distinction between devises of land in England for charitable purposes and bequests of money to purchase land in England for charitable purposes, for a bequest of this nature may be valid if made by a testator domiciled abroad, although a devise by him of the land would be void: see Re Hewit, [1891] 3 Ch. 568; Canterbury (Mayor, &c., of) v. Wyburn, [1895] A. C. 89; post, p. 272.

CHAPTER IX.

kinds of interests in land, and money arising from the sale of land, may now be given to charity, subject to the requirement that if land is given to charity it must, as a general rule, be sold within a certain time.

Notwithstanding this radical change in the law, the effect of the older acts of 1736 and 1888 is still of practical importance, and the decisions on them must be referred to.

What species of property within the statutes.

The act of 1888, like the act of 1736, extends to leaseholds and money secured on mortgage, whether in fee or for years (l), or by deposit of title-deeds (m), and to arrears of interest on any such mortgage (n), and to money charged by way of mortgage on sums invested on any such mortgage (o), and even to judgment debts, so far as they operate as a charge on real estate (p). Each act also applies to the proceeds of land directed to be sold (q). And where a testator had bequeathed his personal estate upon trusts for a charity, and afterwards contracted to sell real estate, it was held that his lien on the property for the purchase-money was "an interest in land" within the meaning of the statute, and accordingly could not pass with the rest of his personal estate (r). So a sum of money which ought to have been raised for the benefit of A. by the execution of a trust for sale of real estate, was held to constitute an interest in land which could not legally be bequeathed by A. to a charity (s). And it made no difference, as sometimes supposed (t), whether the testator was alone entitled to the whole proceeds of the land directed to be sold, and therefore entitled to take the land unconverted, or whether he was entitled only to a share of the proceeds, or to a sum payable thereout. In either case, if the real estate had not, in fact, been sold before A.'s death, his interest was then an interest in land and within the statute (u).

If a testator gave pure personalty to trustees upon trust to invest in investments which included real securities, and to pay the income to A. for life, and after his death to apply the capital for the benefit of a charity, the fact that the trustees invested the money in real securities did not make the gift to the charity invalid (v). But if the gift to the charity was of the investments as they stood at the death of the tenant for life the case was different (w).

Effect of investing fund in real securities.

If money bequeathed to a charity arose partly out of land and partly out of pure personalty, the bequest was void pro tanto (x). The manner in which charitable legacies given out of a mixed fund abated, is stated in section viii. of this chapter.

Legacy partly arising out of land.

If a testator was entitled to a fund which was charged on or arose out of a trust estate consisting of pure and impure personalty, and bequeathed it to a charity, the validity of the bequest seems to have depended on whether the fund could be apportioned. If it was charged on the pure and impure personalty, it could not be apportioned, and the bequest failed (y). If the fund arose partly out of land and partly out of pure personalty, there seems on principle to have been no reason why it should not be apportioned. Lord Cairns, however, refused to do so in Brook v. Bradley (z); in that case A. directed a conversion of his real and personal estate, and out of the proceeds bequeathed a legacy of 3000*l.* to B., payable after the death of X.; B. predeceased X., having by her will bequeathed her personal property applicable for the purposes of mortmain to trustees for charitable purposes; Lord Cairns considered that the legacy of 3000*l.* was "charged" on the real and personal estate of A. and therefore could not be apportioned. Malins, V.-C., in a similar case (a) found no difficulty in apportioning the legacy according to the values of the real estate and personal estate of the first testator, and his decision seems correct. Fry, L. J., in Re Watts (b), pointed out the distinction between money arising partly out of land and partly out of personalty, and money charged on land and personalty.

which, during the life of the tenant for life was subject to a power of investment in real securities, and the testator bequeathed this interest to a charity, the existence of the power did not affect the validity of the bequest, if it was never exercised (c). But if, at the date of the will and at the date of the testator's death, part of the trust fund was invested in real securities, the bequest failed pro tanto (d).

Property
savouring of realty.

Early decisions respect-shares and debentures.

By the older authorities the act of Geo. II. was held to extend to every description of property savouring of the realty; as, the privilege by a grant from the Crown of laying chains in the river Thames for mooring ships (e); canal shares (f); and money secured by assignment of turnpike tolls (g), or of the poor's rate and county rates (h). These authorities were followed in comparatively recent times by similar decisions regarding money secured by mortgage of the rates imposed on the occupiers of houses by improvement commissioners (i), or by mortgage of railway (j), harbour (k), dock (l), bridge (m), or canal (n) tolls, all which are commonly called debentures (o). All these were held to be within the plain words of the act, "charges or incumbrances affecting hereditaments."

But "the current of modern decisions is against the older cases, and while there is to be discovered an inclination formerly to carry the provisions of the act beyond the legislature, the tendency of modern decisions has been the other way" (p). Thus charges on improvement rates (q), or harbour duties (r), or on the undertaking of a waterworks corporation (s), or on the borough funds of municipal corporations (t), though arising partly from rents of land, have been held not to give the holders an interest in land so as to be within the mischief of the act (u). And moneys charged on police rates are not within the act, as they do not affect the land, but merely give a right to call for payment out of the rates (v). But if money is secured by a direct charge on the land, it confers an interest in the land and is within the act (w).

It is also settled that shares in all joint stock companies or partnerships, whether incorporated or not (x), having power to hold land for trading purposes (y), where such land is vested in the corporation or in individuals (as the case may be), in trust only to use the land for the purpose of profit as part of the stock in trade, even though the undertaking be based entirely upon the holding of land, as in the cases of railway, dock, market, gas, canal, mining, and land-jobbing companies, and also, of course, where the holding of land is only incidental to the business, as in the case of banking and assurance companies, are exempted from the operation of the act (z). The exemption does not depend on the clause frequently inserted in acts and deeds of settlement declaring shares to be personal estate and transmissible as such (a), nor on the nature of the business (b), but on the nature of the individual shareholder's interest (bb). of a company the shareholders may become specifically interested in the real property, is to be considered as a remote event, and no more avoiding a bequest of a share to a charity than a like bequest of a simple contract debt would be avoided, because it might ultimately become a judgment debt, and thus a charge upon realty (c).

This doctrine was fully adopted in Entwistle v. Davis (d), where shares in land companies were held not to be within the statute. But if the land of a company or partnership be vested in any person in trust, not for the purposes of the undertaking generally, but for the individual shareholders or partners in proportion to their shares, then such shares are an interest in land within the meaning of the act of Geo. II., for then the individual shareholder would have power to call upon the trustee, not merely for his share of the profits, but for part of the very land itself, which, in the cases previously considered, he could not do (e). So a share in a private partnership, holding land, is within the statute, since (unlike a share in a public company) it cannot be realised without sale of the land (f).

Later decisions.

The current of decision regarding debentures secured by mortgage of the undertaking of a railway or similar company has also been reversed (g), and it is now settled that, as all that the mortgagee can touch under such an instrument, is the profits of the undertaking, he has not such a charge on hereditaments as falls within the act (h).

Principle of Attree v. Howe applies to undertakings of all public bodies.

The principle of the decision is applicable to the debentures of all public bodies with parliamentary powers and duties to be exercised for the public benefit, as harbour, dock, canal, and

But if the bonds or debentures issued by a public body amount to a specific assignment of certain tolls, and such tolls constitute an interest in land, or if the securities are by statute charged on real estate, they are within the mischief of the act, and could not, before 1891, be given to charitable purposes (k).

Growing crops, which pass under a devise of the land on which they are growing, and clearly, therefore, savour of realty, are within the act (l). But rent, when due, is in the nature of fruit fallen: it is severed from the land, and the right of distress is not an interest in land, but merely a right to enter and enforce payment of the debt by seizure of the chattels there found. Arrears of rent may, therefore, be bequeathed to a charity; but not rent accruing after the testator's death in respect of land contracted by him to be sold (m). So may tenant's fixtures, which, on the determination of his lease, the testator might carry away with him (n).

CHAPTER IX.

It was held, under the old law, that where the conveying of land to a charity was enjoined as a condition subsequent, as where the devise was to A., on condition that he conveyed Whiteacre (part of the devised estate) to a charity, the condition alone was void, and the devise was absolute (s). It is submitted that under the Mortmain Act of 1891 (t) such a condition would be valid.

Where trustees may select charities exempt from act.

If a testator devises land, or bequeaths a fund consisting wholly or partly of impure personalty, to such charitable institutions as his trustees may determine, and the trustees make a selection, this operates as the exercise of a power of appointment, and the names of the institutions selected are read into the will; if the institutions so selected, or any of them, are exempt from the act, they take their shares in full (u), but as to such of them as are subject to the act, their shares fail wholly or partially in accordance with the rule mentioned below (sec. viii.) (v).

According to the judgment of Kay, J., in Re Clark (w), the decision in Lewis v. Allenby turned on the use by the testator of the expression "hospitals and other institutions," and he therefore declined to hold that a bequest of impure personalty to trustees upon trust "to give it to the poor as they may think fit" could be valid, even if the trustees selected charitable institutions exempt from the Mortmain Acts. The distinction seems somewhat technical, but Re Clark has been referred to in later cases without disapproval (x).

Bequest of proceeds of real estates to charity illegal.

Though the act of 1888, like the act of Geo. II., does not in terms apply to the proceeds of land directed to be sold, yet it is settled by construction, that a fund of this nature is within its spirit and meaning (y), on the ground, it should seem, that the legatee might have elected to take it as land (z); and a legacy payable out of such a fund of course shared the same fate (a).

mont v. Oliveira, L. R., 4 Ch. 309, post, p. 272; and a bequest of pure personalty, to be expended in the purchase of land in a foreign country for charitable purposes, was not within the Mortmain Act; Att.-Gen. v. Mill, 2 Dow. & Cl. 393; Re Geck, 69 L. T. 819; see post, p. 272.

But not a mere debt due under a settlement from the settlor's estate to the trustees, and appointed in favour of a charity under a general power contained in the settlement, though such debt be

The act expressly embraces the converse case of money being directed to be laid out in "land" (b), and the prohibition applied not only where the investment in "land" was expressly directed by the will, but also where it resulted from the nature and regulations of the charity itself (c).

In Crafton v. Frith (cc), a testator directed his residue to be applied for certain educational purposes, and in purchasing land to be let out to the poor at a low rent: it was held that the residue was divisible into two parts, and that the bequest of one part for the purchase of land was void.

A recommendation to trustees to purchase land is imperative, and, consequently, had the same invalidating effect as a trust which is mandatory in terms (d). But a mere power had not this effect (e). So if an option was given to the trustees to lay out the money in land, or upon government or personal security (f), or, generally, to execute the trust in either of two ways, the one lawful, the other not (g), or, if the regulations of the charity were such that the money bequeathed might, if the act were out of the way, be applied either in one way or the other (h), the bequest was valid (i). It was attempted to bring within the scope of this principle a direction to invest on such mortgage securities as the trustees should approve, which, it was contended, authorised the trustees to lay out the fund on mortgages of personal chattels, or on Irish or Scotch real securities (some of which the testator was already possessed of); but Lord Langdale, considering that the reasoning savoured too much of refinement, held the bequest to be void (j). CHAPTER IX.

Where the purchase of land is the ultimate object, the trust is bad.

Legacy valid where the purchase of land is not essential to the trust.

So, if investment in land was the ultimate destination of the money, the bequest was not protected by the circumstance of provision being made for its suspension during an indefinite period ; and, therefore, a gift of personal estate, to be laid out in the purchase of lands, has been repeatedly held to be void, although the trustees were empowered to invest the money in the funds until an eligible purchase could be made (l) ; neither would a direction to purchase, though accompanied by a legal alternative direction for the application of the money in case the purchase cannot be conveniently made, give the trustees such a discretion as to take the bequest out of the statute, where there was no impediment to the primary trust but the statute (m). These determinations have clearly overruled Grimmett v. Grimmett (n).

It is clear, that where the will is silent as to the purchase or acquisition of land, and the charitable trust or purpose is of a nature which admits of its being fully and conveniently executed without such purchase or acquisition, the legacy is good. Thus, where the testator bequeathed 2,800*l*. Three per cent. Reduced annuities, and directed the dividends to be applied "for and towards establishing a school," Lord Loughborough said, that this did not include the purchase or renting of land : the master might teach in his own house, or in the church (o). So, in another case, the bequest of personalty, "to be a perpetual endowment and maintenance of two schools," was considered, by Richards, C. B., to be so far good ; though it was rendered void by the addition of a recommendation to purchase land (p). And even where the interest of the bequeathed fund was directed to be applied in "providing a proper school-house," Sir J. Leach, V.-C., thought that, as the intention might be executed by hiring a house, without the necessity of purchasing land, the bequest was valid ; and that, too, though the will contained expressions showing that the testator contemplated the perpetuity of the charity (q). So, where the trustees were expressly directed to apply the income of a charity fund in the purchase or rental of an appropriate building (r). Also where trustees were directed to apply a fund upon trust to hire rooms for the reception of poor women (s).

But in these cases much reliance was placed on the circumstance that the purposes of the will were to be answered out of the annual income as it arose, leaving the principal untouched. Where a legacy was given towards “establishing” a school near the Angel Inn at E., provided a further sum could be raised in aid thereof if found necessary ; Sir G. Turner, V.-C., said that the first words indicated an intention to occupy a site in the neighbourhood referred to ; and that the latter words removed all doubt, shewing that the establishment of the school was not to be by a succession of small payments, but by the immediate expenditure of a sum of money. He thought it clear that the intention was that land should be purchased (t).

Similar decisions were come to in Dunn v. Bownas (u), where a testator bequeathed a sum of money to the mayor and corporation of N., in trust for the purpose of “establishing” a hospital ; and in Tatham v. Drummond (v), where there was a bequest of money to be applied towards the “establishment” of slaughter-houses. charitable endowment" (b), is good. A bequest to establish an "institution" may also be good if the purpose of the institution as described does not require the purchase of land (c).

Endowment of future church.

If a testator bequeaths a fund for endowing a church neither erected nor commenced before his death, the Court will direct an inquiry whether the fund can be so applied within a reasonable time (d).

Legacy to be applied in erecting a building, bad.

It has been much questioned whether a bequest of money, to be applied in the "erection" of a school-house or other building, for charitable purposes, was bad under the old law, as involving a trust to purchase. Lord Hardwicke considered that if the trustees could get a piece of ground given to them, so that land need not be purchased, the gift was good (e); but the contrary is now settled (f): and to make such a bequest valid, in cases within the act of 1736 or 1888, the testator must either point to land already in mortmain, or he must forbid the purchase of land (g). Thus, in Mather v. Scott (h), where a testator bequeathed a legacy to trustees, with a request that they would entreat the lord of the manor to grant land for building almshouses, Lord Langdale, M. R., held that the language of the bequest was not sufficiently expressed to exclude a purchase, and therefore the gift failed. And it is equally clear that a legacy, on condition that the legatee provide land for effecting the testator's object, was void, as being in truth a purchase of the land from the legatee (i). And it did not avail, that charity legatees, by whom a fund was directed to be laid out in the erection of buildings, possessed and offered to appropriate for the purpose land already in mortmain, unless the bequest were so framed as not to admit of a new purchase being made for the occasion (j); nor was a bequest to build made valid by a proviso that the legacy should not be paid until the building had been commenced (k).

CHAPTER IX.

But if the testator expressly forbade a purchase, though he declared his expectation or desire that land would be provided from other sources (l), or if the direction was to build "when and so soon as land shall at any time be given for the purpose" (m), the bequest was valid: for the statute does not forbid the dedication of land to charity by act inter vivos; on the contrary, it expressly regulates the manner of doing so, and there is nothing to invalidate a bequest of money for building upon land so provided (mm).

Bequest to build good, if the will forbids the purchase of land.

If the legacy is conditional on land being acquired at some future indefinite time the legacy is, of course, void, but if the gift is absolute, and only the mode of executing the trust is postponed, the legacy is valid (n). In such a case, the Court will direct an inquiry whether the necessary land has been provided, and if there is no prospect of the land being provided within a reasonable time, the Court will direct the fund to be applied cy-près (o).

A direction to the trustees not to violate the Mortmain Acts, or to have due regard to the application of the fund being consistent with the laws then in force, is equivalent to forbidding the purchase of land (p).

The bequest of a sum of money to be applied in the erection of buildings on land which is already devoted to charitable purposes (q), or in the repair and improvement of buildings appropriated to charity (r), is unquestionably valid, as by such gifts no additional land is thrown into mortmain(s). But, as before stated, a reference to land already in mortmain must be found in the will. A bequest to build a parsonage house at C. "in manner as I have already promised the same," was held to refer to a transaction by which a site had already been appropriated for the purpose, and so by implication to the site itself (t). So a bequest to build a parsonage house in connection with B. church was upheld, on the ground that a site had in fact (though this was not noticed in the will) been appropriated to the purpose, and that the trustees would not have been justified in purchasing any other land for the purpose(u). And a bequest to help enlarge the parish church at M. was held good as impliedly referring to the glebe or churchyard (v). But a bequest "to erect a new chapel at H. instead of the one now in use when such an erection shall take place," was held not to be a reference to the site on which the old chapel stood (w).

Legacy to be applied in discharging an incumbrance on charity property invalid.

A legacy to be applied in the liquidation of a subsisting incumbrance on real estate, which is already subject to charitable uses, appears to have been considered as not falling within the same principle as a legacy to build on land so subject, but as appropriating to charity a new interest in land. Thus, a bequest of a sum of money, to be applied in paying off a mortgage debt on a meeting-house, could not be supported under the old law (x); and it mattered not that the incumbrance was equitable only (y).

Legacy founded on a devise which fails, void.

Where a legacy, which, standing alone, would be valid, was founded upon and derived its purpose and object from an illegal devise, it was necessarily involved in the failure of such devise. Thus, if a testator, after devising certain messuages to be converted into almshouses, bequeathed the interest of a sum of money to the occupiers of such houses, as the devise was clearly void, the legacy was equally so (z). Or, if a testator devised a messuage to be used as a school-house for the education of poor children, and bequeathed a fund to trustees, with a direction to apply the income in keeping the school-house in repair, and providing a master, the statute, by invalidating the devise of the house, deprived the pecuniary legacy of its object, which consequently failed (a); and in some other instances, presenting not quite so simple and obvious an application of the principle, a bequest, valid in itself, has been held to fail, from the impracticability of the general scheme, of which it forms a part (b).

(s) The general principle is discussed in Edwards v. Hall, 11 Ha. 1; 6 D. M. & G. 74. As to the evidence required in these cases, that the land on which the expenditure is to be made has been effectually devoted to charity, vide Ingley v. Dobson, 4 Russ. 342; Shaw v. Pickthall, Dan. 92.

It is to be observed, that if a legacy, which is directed to be laid out in land, is actually paid, (the party paying it not availing himself of the statute,) and the trustee lays it out accordingly, the Court will not execute the trust (c). But if lands be devised in trust for charity, and have been held and applied accordingly for a long series of years, it will be presumed against the heir, that all proper means have since been taken to dedicate the property effectually to the charity (d).

Equity will not execute trust though the legacy has been paid.

VII.—Secret Trusts for Charity.—As Mr. Jarman points out (dd): “The statute of the 9th Geo. II. cannot be evaded by a secret trust, and the heir may compel a devisee to disclose any promise which he may have made to the testator to devote the land to charity (e). And such promise, if denied by the devisee, may be proved by evidence aliunde (f). The trust, by whatever means established, invalidates the devise (g). This doctrine evidently assumes that the trust, if legal, would have been binding on the conscience of, and might have been enforced against, the devisee; and this ground failing, the rule does not apply. As where a testator, after devising lands by a will duly attested, declares a trust in favour of charity by an unattested paper or by parol, the statute law, which affords to the devisee a valid defence against any claim on the part of the charity, of course equally defends him against the claim of the heir, founded on the charitable trust (h). The case would be different, however, if the devisee had induced the testator to give him the estate absolutely, under an assurance that the unattested paper was a sufficient declaration of the trust for a charity" (i).

And if the testator communicates to the devisee that the devise is made to him for charitable purposes which the testator means to specify, and the testator dies without doing so, it seems clear that the devisee will hold the land upon trust for the heir-at-law (j).

Secret trust, when valid.

In cases where the statute does not apply, so that the testator could, if he pleased, have devised the land for certain charitable purposes, a devise to A. upon a secret trust for those charitable purposes is valid: as where the testator devises in this manner land which he might have devised under the Church Building Act (k).

And it is assumed that, in cases falling within the Mortmain, &c., &c., Act, 1891, land may be devised upon a secret trust for a charity, with the same effect as if the devise had been made directly to the charity (kk).

The law relating to secret trusts in general is discussed elsewhere (l).

Assets not

charity.

VIII.—Assets not marshalled in Favour of Charity.—The rule is thus stated by Mr. Jarman (m): "Marshalling assets is the adoption of this principle: that where there are two funds and two parties, one of whom has a claim exclusively upon one fund, and the other the liberty of resorting to either, the Court will send the latter party primarily to that fund from which the former is excluded; or, if he should have actually resorted to their common fund, will allow the other to stand in his place to that extent. The application of this principle has been denied to charities; and accordingly, where property which cannot, is combined, in the same gift, with funds which can, be bequeathed for charitable purposes, and the disposition embraces several objects or purposes, some charitable and others not, the Courts hold that the purposes not charitable cannot be thrown exclusively upon that part of the subject of disposition which is incapable by law of being devoted to charity, in order to let in the charitable purposes upon the remainder (n).

“ Thus, if a testator give his real and personal estate to trustees, upon trust to sell and pay his debts and legacies, and to apply the residue for charitable purposes, the Court will not throw the debts and legacies exclusively on the proceeds of the real estate, and the mortgage securities and leaseholds, in order that the charitable bequest may take effect so far as possible; nor, on the other hand, will it direct the debts and legacies to come out of the pure personalty for the purpose of defeating the charitable residuary bequest to the utmost possible extent. Steering a middle course, equity directs the debts and legacies to come out of the whole estate, real and personal, pro rata; for instance, supposing the real funds (including the leaseholds and mortgage securities) to constitute two-fifths of the entire property, then two-fifths of these charges would be satisfied out of such real funds, and the remaining three-fifths out of the pure personalty (o); and, after bearing the charges in these several proportions, the former would belong to the heir or next-of-kin (as the case might be), and the latter to the charity-residuary legatee. And, by parity of reasoning, it should seem that if a testator bequeath pecuniary legacies to charities, and leave a general residue to others, consisting partly of leaseholds or real securities, and partly of pure personalty, the legacies will be void pro tanto, i.e., in the proportion which the real funds bear to the entire property, though the pure personalty should be sufficient to pay all the legacies. The proper course, in such case, it is conceived, would be to pay the debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, (being all the prior charges to which the general residue was liable,) in the first instance, out of the whole property, pro ratâ (p), and then to provide for the pecuniary legacies in like manner; the effect of which would be that the charity-legacies, so far as this rateable apportionment threw them upon the leaseholds and real securities, would be void.'

conclusion.

When Mr. Jarman wrote, direct authority on the point last referred to was scanty (q), but the principle stated by him is now clearly settled, and accordingly every charitable legacy bequeathed by any testator dying before 6th August 1891, whose will does not contain the usual clause directing such legacies to be paid exclusively out of the pure personalty, and the general residue of whose property consists partly of leaseholds or real securities, is void pro tanto (r).

The effect of this doctrine may sometimes be to render the whole legacy void. Thus, in Cherry v. Mott (s), the testator directed his executors to purchase of the governors of Christ's Hospital a presentation to that charity for a boy, the son of a freeman of the borough of Hertford; the purchase-money to be paid out of his personal estate. The testator's personal estate not being all pure personalty, Sir C. Pepys, M. R., was of opinion that the bequest never could take effect; for if the executors had agreed for the purchase at a given sum, that sum must have been raised proportionately out of the two sorts of personalty, and the gift of so much as it was necessary to raise out of the personalty savouring of the realty, would have been void, and consequently the full purchase-money never could be raised; and the testator's intended gift failed by reason of the impossibility of making the purchase.

The same strict rule is applied where the testator directs a particular fund consisting partly of impure personalty, to be applied to several purposes, some charitable and some illegal, so that the (p) In making the apportionment, the respective values of the real and personal estates are to be taken as at the time of the death of the testator, and not as at the time of apportionment, Calvert v. Armitage, 1 H. & M. 446, overruling Robinson v. London Hospital, 10 Hare, 29.

portion applicable to the charitable purposes has to be ascertained by the Court: the amount so ascertained must abate according to the proportions which the pure and impure parts of the fund bear to one another (t).

Where the testator has directed a charity legacy to be paid out of his pure personalty, the testator himself has marshalled (so to speak) his own assets, and the Court only prevents the arrangement made by him from being defeated by accidental circumstances. The efficacy of such a direction to make a charity legacy payable in full out of the pure personalty, in priority to other legacies, was established by Lord Truro in Robinson v. Geldard (u). As between the charity and the other legatees, he said the case was analogous to that of a demonstrative legacy (v). But this was by way of illustration only, and not of definition: the direction does no more than regulate the priority of the legatees inter se; it does not exempt the charitable legacy from contribution to the payment of debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, as it would do if it made the legacy strictly demonstrative. These prior charges will still come rateably, and in the first place, out of the pure and impure personalty (w). Therefore, in order to make charitable legacies effectual as far as possible, the debts, funeral and testamentary expenses should be expressly and exclusively charged on the personalty savouring of realty (x).

And where the charitable legacies are themselves residuary, this is the most appropriate form of direction with regard also to the payment of other legacies (y). But of course it matters not what the form is if it sufficiently shows the testator's intention. Thus,

CHAPTER IX.

Testator may himself marshal his assets.

Express marshalling where the charitable bequest is residuary.

Dimsdale*, 6 Beav. 462, Lord Langdale had doubted the sufficiency of such a direction, and in Philanthropic Society v. Kemp, 4 Beav. 581, had decided that it was insufficient to counteract in favour of the charities some special words which he thought expressly regulated the order in which the several portions of the personal estate were to be applied in payment of debts and legacies. But as to this, see Miles v. Harrison, L. R., 9 Ch. 321. Even a direction that charity legacies shall be paid "exclusively out of personal estate," seems to have been held sufficient to make them payable in full out of pure personalty; Roberts v. Jones, W. N. 1880, p. 96.

CHAPTER IX.

in Wills v. Bourne (z), where a testator directed his debts, legacies, and funeral and testamentary expenses to be paid out of his real estate, and, so far as that was deficient, out of his personal estate, and bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to certain charities, declaring that "only such part of his estate should be comprised in the residue as might by law be bequeathed for charitable purposes": it was held by Lord Selborne that the testator had thereby excluded impure personalty from the residue: and that it followed by necessary implication that the realty and impure personalty must be applied for those purposes (debts as well as legacies) which were to be satisfied before a residue was arrived at. So, in Miles v. Harrison (a), where a testator directed that his personal estate should be converted, and that out of the proceeds his debts and legacies should be paid, and gave the residue to three charities in equal shares, with a direction to pay the charitable legacies out of the pure personalty, "which shall be reserved by my trustees for that purpose," it was held that the debts and other legacies were thrown wholly on the impure personalty. Lord Cairns observed, that although the testator intended creditors and those other legatees to have the security of his whole personal estate, yet that, as between them and the charities, those who had the two funds should go first on that which the charities could not take.

Again, the pure personalty may be the subject of a specific bequest to a charity, in which case it will be entitled to the privileges and exemptions that belong to a legacy of that character (b).

But if the testator directs his debts and legacies to be paid out of residue and then gives to a charity such part of the residue as can lawfully be given to charitable purposes, this does not shew an intention to marshal the assets in favour of the charity (c).

In Miles v. Harrison (d), there was also a particular pecuniary bequest to another charity, unaided by any direction concerning its payment; and the further question arose whether this legacy, which could in no part be satisfied out of the impure personalty, was not also debarred from the pure personalty by the direction reserving the latter for payment of the residuary bequest. "If, as I assume," said Lord Cairns, "the gift of the residue amounts to a direction that the personal estate shall be marshalled, a direction of that kind cannot operate to defeat in toto the pecuniary legacy to the charity ; that legacy will stand as if nothing at all had been said about marshalling in the residuary gift ; for the essence of marshalling is that it puts those only to marshal who have got two funds, and this charitable legatee has only one."

With regard to legacies charged on real estate, Mr. Jarman remarks (e) : " Where a charitable legacy is charged on real estate as an auxiliary fund in aid of the personalty, (and such, it will be hereafter seen, is always the effect of a mere general charge,) the legacy will be valid or not, and either wholly or in part, according to the event of the personalty proving sufficient for its complete liquidation, or not.

Effect where land is charged as an auxiliary fund.

" As the validity of a charity legacy depends on its not being to come out of a real fund, the point of construction whether the legacy is payable out of personal or real estate, is sometimes warmly contested on this account ; and in the consideration of this question, it scarcely need be observed, no disposition has been manifested by the Courts to strain the rules of construction in favour of charity (f).

" Never, indeed, was the spirit of any legislative enactment more vigorously and zealously seconded by the judicature, than the statute of the 9th of George the 2nd. This is abundantly evident from the general tone of the adjudications ; but the two points in which it is most strikingly displayed are, first, the holding a gift to charity of the proceeds of the sale of real estate to be absolutely void, instead of giving to the charity legatee the option to take it as money, according to the rule since adopted in the case of a similar gift to an alien (g) ; and, secondly, the refusal of equity to marshal assets in favour of a charity, in conformity to its general principle ; that principle being evidently founded on an anxiety to carry out, as far as possible, the intention of testators. In this solitary case, the intention has been allowed to be subverted by a mere slip or omission of the testator, which the Court had the power of easily correcting by an arrangement of the funds " (h).

the legacy is payable out of the pure personalty, and is therefore good, Wilson v. Thomas, 3 My. & K. 579.

(g) Ante, p. 91. However, the disclaimer of the heir, against which the statute is directed, is equally produced whether the land is sold or not.

(h) The first edition contains a long note by Mr. Jarman criticising the policy of the statute of 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, and urging a relaxation of its prohibitions. Mr. Jarman's suggestion that

CHAPTER IX.

Charitable corporations.

IX. Exceptions from the Statutory Restraint.—Where a corporation for charitable purposes is empowered by private act of parliament (passed since 9 Geo. 2, c. 36) to acquire land by devise, this has the operation of enabling any testator to devise land or bequeath impure personalty to the corporation (j). But a private act passed before 1736 has not that operation, even if it is in effect re-enacted by an act passed since 1736 (j).

And an act of parliament which confers on a charitable corporation the right to purchase, take, hold, receive, or enjoy lands, does not enable it to acquire land otherwise than in the mode prescribed by the stat. Geo. 2, c. 36, the effect of the clause being equivalent only to a licence from the Crown to hold in mortmain (k), and not therefore enabling it to take by devise.

Exception in favour of two English Universities, and Eton, Winchester, and Westminster.

It will be observed that the act of Geo. 2, expressly allows gifts to the two English Universities and their colleges, and the three colleges of Eton, Winchester, and Westminster (l). And by the seventh section of the act of 1888 this exception is extended to the Universities of London and Durham, the Victoria University, and their colleges and houses of learning, and to Keble College, Oxford. It is clear that neither statute authorises a devise to a college in trust for other charitable objects (m); but it seems not to be essential that the trust should embrace the whole college; a trust for the benefit of particular members would be within the proviso; and therefore, a devise to the Master and Fellows of Christ's College, in trust that they and their successors should apply the rents for "without entrenching on the salutary enactment which prevents the land of the country from being locked up in perpetuity," it might be provided "that wherever real estate, or the produce of real estate, is disposed of in this manner, the property should be sold or converted, and the proceeds only paid over to the charity," has at last (1891) been adopted by the legislature.

(j) Perring v. Trail, L. R., 18 Eq. 88. So trustees having a power of selecting charities to benefit by a testamentary gift may select charities empowered to acquire lands by devise: see Re Ovey, 31 Ch. D. 113, above, p. 256. In Robinson v. London Hospital, 10 Ha. 19, the power to devise lands was given by charter. The judgment of Turner, V.-C., is somewhat cryptic, and it is not easy to say what his decision was. It is clear that the gift failed as to part of the residue.

tish Museum v. White, 2 S. & St. 595; Nethersole v. Indigent Blind School, L. R., 11 Eq. 1; Chester v. Chester, L. R., 12 Eq. 444. See and consider with reference to this point, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 94, s. 23, enabling owners of appropriated tithes to annex the same to the parsonages, &c., of the parishes where they arise, Denton v. Manners, 25 Beav. 38, 2 De G. & J. 675.

(l) For an instance of such a devise, see 3 Ves. 641. It has never been decided whether this exception extended to colleges founded since the act, as Downing College, Cambridge. Lord Northington considered that it was confined to colleges antecedently established, see Att.-Gen. v. Tancred, 1 Ed. 16; but Lord Loughborough appears to have dissented from this opinion, see Att.-Gen. v. Bowyer, 3 Ves. 728.

(m) Att.-Gen. v. Tancred, 1 Ed. 15, 1 W. Bl. 90, Amb. 351; see also Blandford v. Fackerell, 4 Br. C. C. 394, 2 Ves. jun. 238; Att.-Gen. v. Munby, 1 Mer. 327.

some undergraduate student, has been held to be good (n). But the devise must be for collegiate or academical purposes; and a gift to the college, to the intent that an individual member (the senior fellow for the time being) should live in the testator's house, and entertain the poor, and distribute medicine and books among them, was held to be void on this principle (o). Lord Loughborough appears to have thought, that, if a devise of real estate to a college was refused by the college, as of course it may be, whether the devise be upon trust or otherwise (p), it might, as the lands were originally devised to a valid purpose, be executed cy-près (q).

The exception made by the act of Geo. 2 in respect of property in Scotland, has been held to apply only to the locality of the lands destined to the trust (r); precluding, therefore, the devise of lands in England to a Scottish charity, but admitting of English personalty being bequeathed to be laid out in lands in Scotland, so far as is consistent with the Scotch law, which permits the destination of real estate to some kinds of charity (s). It has been held, that the circumstances of the charity being Scotch, and Scotchmen only being eligible as trustees of it, do not conclusively show that the purchase is to be of lands in Scotland, so as to take the bequest out of the statute (t).

Exception in respect of Scotland.

So, of course, a bequest of money to be laid out in lands in Ireland, for charitable purposes, will be good (u). But by a modern statute (v) it is enacted that any donation, devise, or bequest, whereby any estate in lands, tenements or hereditaments in Ireland is conveyed or created for a charitable purpose, must be executed three calendar months before the death of the donor. This enactment does not, however, appear to extend to bequests of money to be laid out in land.

CHAPTER IX.

in its causes, its objects, its provisions, its qualifications, and its exceptions, it is a law wholly English, calculated for the purposes of local policy, complicated with local establishments, and incapable without great incongruity in the effect, of being transferred, as it stands, into the code of any other country (w). There is therefore nothing in the act of 1736 or 1888 to prevent a person domiciled in a British colony from leaving money for the purchase of land in England for a charitable object: unless prohibited by the law of the colony, such a bequest is valid (x).

Foreign land. Land situate in foreign countries outside the British Empire is obviously not within the acts. Consequently a bequest of money, to be laid out in the erection of almshouses abroad, is valid so far as the law of England is concerned (y).

Nor does either of the acts prevent money arising from the sale of land in a foreign country from being bequeathed to charities (z).

Custom of London.

By the custom of London resident freemen might devise land in mortmain (a). By the general act De religiosis (b) the custom would have been abolished, but that afterwards there came a general confirmation of the customs of London by statute (c). There is no saving of any custom in the statute of George, any more than there was in the statute De religiosis; and as there has been no subsequent confirmation of the customs of London (d), it follows, according to Lord Coke, that the statute of George was binding on the city of London (e). At all events it is clear that the custom of London applies only to lands in London (f).

Statutes allowing land to be devoted to particular charities.

The legislature has, in several instances, relaxed in favour of particular objects the restriction on disposing of land to charitable purposes (g). Thus, by the Land Tax Redemption Act (42 Geo. 3, (w) Per Sir W. Grant, M. R., in Att.-Gen. v. Stewart, 2 Mer. 143; see also Att.-Gen. v. Giles, 5 L. J. N. S. Ch. 44; Whicker v. Hume, 1 D. M. & G. 506, 14 Beav. 509, 7 H. L. Ca. 124; Mayor of Lyons v. East India Company, 1 Moo. P. C. C. 298; Jex v. McKinney, 14 App. Ca. 77. The same considerations evidently apply to the act of 1888.

(e) See also per Sir R. P. Arden, M. R., Highmore on Mortmain, p. 127; and see generally as to these customs the authorities cited in Reg. v. Mayor, &c. of London, 13 Q. B. 1.

(f) Middleton v. Cater, 4 Br. C. C. 409. If the custom has still any force, it is saved by 51 & 52 Vict. c. 42, s. 12.

(g) By sect. 8 of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, it is enacted that "where by any statute now in force any provision of the enactments hereby repealed is excluded either wholly or partially from application, or

c. 116, s. 50), money may, by will or otherwise, be given to be applied in the redemption of the land tax on hereditaments settled to charitable uses. So, the statute 43 Geo. 3, c. 107, authorises the devise of lands to the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty; and again, the Gifts for Churches Act, 1803 (stat. 43 Geo. 3, c. 108), empowers persons, by will executed three months before death, to devise lands not exceeding five acres, or goods and chattels not exceeding in value 500*l.* (h), for erecting, rebuilding, repairing, purchasing, or providing any church or chapel where the liturgy of the Church of England may be used, or any mansion-house for the residence of the minister, or any outbuildings, offices, churchyard (i), or glebe, for the same respectively; but no glebe, containing upwards of fifty acres, is to be augmented above one acre (j); and the promotion of these or similar objects has been further encouraged by an act (k) legalising the devise of lands to or in trust for (l) the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, in aid of the endowment and erection of district churches. Again, the Public Parks, Schools, and Museums Act, 1871, authorised gifts by will, made twelve calendar months before, and inrolled in the books of the Charity Commissioners within six calendar months after, the testator's death, of limited portions of land for any of the objects mentioned is applied with modification, in every such case the corresponding provision of this act shall be excluded or applied in like extent and manner."

(h) By sect. 2, if the devise exceed the limit, the excess only is void, and the specific five acres may be allotted by the L. C. As to the case of a bequest of personalty exceeding 500*l.* see Girdlestone v. Creed, 10 Ha. 480. In Sinnett v. Herbert, L. R., 7 Ch. 232, a gift comprising pure and impure personalty, for building or endowing a church, was held to carry 500*l.* worth of the impure personalty, besides all the pure personalty, on the ground that the 500*l.* being all which could properly be spent in building (see Re Ireland's Will, 12 L. J. Ch. 381), it must be assumed that the trustees would apply all the rest for the other purposes. See also Dixon v. Butler, 3 Y. & C. 677; Champney v. Davy, 11 Ch. D. 949. As under this act, one may devise, he so may convey, reserving a life estate, per Sir G. Turner, L. J., Fisher v. Brierley, 1 D. F. & J. 664. But the act does not authorise a gift of money, even within the limit of 500*l.*, to arise by sale of land, Church Building Society v. Coles, 1 K. & J. 145, 5 D. M. & G. 324. A devise of land, not exceeding in extent the prescribed limit, with a building upon it, is not invalidated by the secret trust that the devisee shall hold the land and building upon trust to convey the same as and for a parish or district church in perpetuity, O'Brien v. Tyssen, 28 Ch. D. 372. With regard to bequests of "goods and chattels" for purposes authorised by the act, it has been held that the limit of 500*l.* has been impliedly repealed by sect. 7 of the Mortmain, &c. Act, 1891: Re Douglas, [1905] 1 Ch. 279. As already noticed (ante, p. 59), the Gifts for Churches Act does not remove the disability of coverture: Re Smith's Estate, 35 Ch. D. 589.

(i) A bequest for maintenance of a family vault in a churchyard cannot be supported as one for repair of a churchyard under this act, Re Rigley's Trusts, 36 L. J. Ch. 147; Re Vaughan, 33 Ch. D. 187. But a bequest for keeping a churchyard in repair is within the act: ibid. As to a church clock, see Re Hendry, 56 L. T. 908.

in the title to the act (m). And by the Ancient Monuments Act, 1882 (n), any person may by will give, devise, or bequeath to the Commissioners of Works all his estate and interest in any ancient monument to which this act applies, and the Commissioners may accept the same. Mortmain, &c., Act,

X.—The Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891.—This act applies to the wills of testators dying after 5th August, 1891. Section 3 repeals the definition of “land” in the act of 1888, and enacts that “land” in that act shall include tenements and hereditaments, corporeal and incorporeal, of any tenure, but not money secured on land, or other personal estate arising from or connected with land. Section 5 enacts that land may be assured by will to (m) 34 Vict. c. 13. This act is repealed by the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, but in effect re-enacted by the sixth section of that act, which provides (1) that Parts I. and II. of the act shall not apply to an assurance by will of land, or of personal estate to purchase land, for a public park, school-house for an elementary school, or public museum; and (2) “that a will containing such an assurance . . . must be executed not less than twelve months before the death of the assurator, or be a reproduction in substance of a devise made in a previous will in force at the time of such reproduction, and which was executed not less than twelve months before the death of the assurator, and must be enrolled in the books of the Charity Commissioners within six months after the death of the testator.” By sub-sect. (3) the quantity of land assured must not exceed 20 acres for a park, 2 acres for a school-house, or 1 acre for a museum. The terms “public park,” “school-house,” “elementary school” and “public museum” are defined in sub-sect. (4) of this section. As to County Councils and other local authorities, see the Mortmain, &c., Amendment Act, 1892. The acts 4 & 5 Vict. c. 38 (school sites), 31 & 32 Vict. c. 44 (sites for religious, educational, literary, &c., purposes), and the Elementary Education Act, 1873, s. 13, sub-sect. 3, exclude gifts by will. The provisions of the act of 31 & 32 Vict.

here referred to, are repealed by the act of 1888, but virtually re-enacted, with the like exclusion of gifts by will, by sect. 7 (ii) of the latter act. The act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 43, empowered municipal corporations to take by devise sites for museums, &c., and also (Harrison v. Corporation of Southampton, 2 Sm. & G. 387) money to be laid out in such sites; but was repealed by the Public Libraries Act, 1850. or for the benefit of any charitable use, but that such land [sic] shall, notwithstanding anything in the will contained to the contrary, be sold within one year from the death of the testator, or such extended time as the Court or the Charity Commissioners may determine. Section 6 enacts that so soon as the time limited for the sale of any lands under any such assurance shall have expired without completion of the sale of the land, the land unsold shall vest forthwith in the Official Trustee of Charity Lands, and the Charity Commissioners shall take all necessary steps for the sale or completion of the sale of such land to be effected with all reasonable speed by the administering trustees for the time being thereof. Section 7 enacts that any personal estate by will directed to be laid out in the purchase of land to or for the benefit of any charitable uses shall, except as hereinafter provided, be held to or for the benefit of the charitable uses as though there had been no such direction to lay it out in the purchase of land. Section 8 provides that the High Court, or any judge thereof sitting at chambers, or the Charity Commissioners, if satisfied that land assured by will to or for the benefit of any charitable use, or proposed to be purchased out of personal estate by will directed to be laid out in the purchase of land, is required for actual occupation for the purposes of the charity and not as an investment, may sanction the retention or acquisition, as the case may be, of such land.

The effect of this act is to repeal sect. 4 of the Mortmain, &c., Act, 1888, so far as it applies to wills, and to allow land to be devised to charities, subject to the provisions of the act as to sale (z). It also allows "impure personalty" to be given to charities, and makes valid a bequest to a charity of money directed to be laid out in the purchase of land (a), although the direction is of itself inoperative (b). And it removes the limit of 500*l.* imposed by the Gifts for Churches Act, 1803, on gifts of personal property for the purposes of the act (c). As the act allows a legacy charged on or payable out of land to be given to a charity, it follows that it has rendered unimportant the old rule that assets are never marshalled in favour of a charity (d).

Act of 1891

Another effect of the act seems to be to make secret trusts of land for charitable purposes valid, because as a devise of land for charitable purposes is now lawful, there seems no reason for holding a secret trust for similar purposes to be unlawful. This conclusion is in accordance with the principle on which O'Brien v. Tyssen (e) was decided.

The following decisions on the act of 1891 may be noted.

Construction of will made before the act.

In Re Bridger (f) it was decided that if a testator, by a will made before the passing of the act, gives to a charitable institution such part of his residuary estate "as may by law be given for charitable purposes," and dies after the passing of the act, the operation of the gift is not restricted to property which under the old law could be given for charitable purposes, but includes real estate, or the proceeds thereof. In Re Hume (g) it was held that an estate in remainder is within the act; it may, therefore, be validly devised to a charity, but must be sold within the time prescribed by the act, or the extended time, if any. In Re Wilkinson (h), and Re Sidebottom (i), it was decided that where real estate is devised to trustees upon an immediate trust to sell and pay the proceeds to a charity, the gift is one of "personal estate arising from land" within sect. 3 of the act, and is not affected by sects. 5 and 6; the trustees are not, however, at liberty to postpone the sale indefinitely. In Re Ryland (j) the testator gave his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust for conversion, but directed that the land should not be sold during the life of his widow without her consent in writing; the rents were payable during the life of the widow as to part to her and as to the remainder to certain charities, and the whole of the residuary estate was given to them on her death: it was held that the reversionary interest of the charities in the proceeds of sale was not "land" within the meaning of the act, but that the share of the charities in the rents during the widow's life was "land" within the meaning of the act, and ought to be sold in accordance with sect. 5.

What is "land" within sect. 3.

Bequest of money to be laid out in land, when not within sect. 7.

In Re Sutton (k) it was held that a bequest of personalty to be laid out in the acquisition of houses to be let to poor persons at low rents is a valid charitable gift, and not affected by sect. 7 of the act.

In Re Church Patronage Trust (l) it was held that the devise of an advowson, upon trusts requiring the trustees to present a fit and proper person to the living from time to time, was not a devise "to or for the benefit of any charitable use" within the meaning of sect. 5.

Extension of time.

In Re Sidebottom (m) it was held that the time limited by sect. 5 may be extended by the Court when and so often as circumstances render it desirable. CHAPTER IX.

The act does not expressly provide for the case of a devise of land for charitable purposes to a corporation not having a licence to acquire and hold land in mortmain, but as the act requires land devised to charitable uses to be sold within a certain time and thus prevents the land from being held in mortmain, it seems clear that a devise to a corporation for charitable purposes is not an assurance in mortmain within the meaning of the act of 1888. Devises to corporations.

In Re Scowcroft (n) a devise of land to the vicar of a certain parish and his successors was held good under the act of 1891, but the point was not taken.

It may be mentioned that devises to technical and industrial institutions, under the statute 55 & 56 Vict. c. 29, are exempt from the requirement as to sale imposed by the Mortmain, &c., Act, 1891. Technical and Industrial Institutions Act, 1892.

Primary meaning of "perpetuity."

I.—General Principle forbidding Perpetuities (a).—A perpetuity, in the primary sense of the word, is a disposition which makes property inalienable for an indefinite period.

As a general rule, every such disposition is void (b). Accordingly, a devise of land or a bequest of personalty upon trust for a purpose or institution which may last for an indefinite period (not being charitable), is void as a perpetuity, or as tending to a perpetuity. Thus, a trust for the maintenance of a private tomb (c), or a picture (d), or a private museum, library, society, or institution (e), or for the encouragement of sport (f), is invalid.

(a) The first three sections of this chapter are new, and the whole of it has been re-written. See Preface. I take this opportunity of expressing my great obligations to Mr. J. C. Gray, not only for the assistance which I have derived from his learned work on the Rule against Perpetuities, but also for his courtesy in discussing various points by correspondence [C. S.].

(b) See the general principle stated in Re Parry and Daggs, 31 Ch. D. 130. As this rule is founded on public policy, it applies to British Colonies: Yeap Cheah Neo v. Ong Cheng Neo, L. R., 6 P. C. 381.

If property is so given to a society or institution that the members can immediately dispose of it, then the objection of perpetuity does not arise, and the gift is valid (g), even where the testator adds directions as to the mode of application (h). But if the intention of the testator is that the property, although given absolutely to the society, shall be held and administered for the benefit of the future as well as the present members, the gift is a perpetuity, and void (i). The difficulty in many cases is to decide whether the testator means to benefit the present members of the society as individuals, or to benefit the society as a quasi-corporation (j). An unlimited gift of the income of property to a society does not amount to the gift of the corpus, but shews an intention that it is given for the benefit of future members; such a gift is therefore void (k).

It seems that a trust for the maintenance of a tomb or monument to the memory of the testator or his family, if restricted to the period of lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards, is valid (l). And if there is clause of forfeiture and a gift over in the event of non-performance of the trust, this is effectual (m). Whether this exception to the general rule also obtains in the case of other trusts without a cestui que trust who can enforce them, does not seem to have been decided.

In Re Dean (n), it was held that a trust for the benefit of a number of animals and the survivor of them was not bad on the score of its tending to a perpetuity, but the decision is clearly erroneous, if and so far as it is based on the theory that any animal, other than a human being, can be a "life" within the meaning of the modern Rule against Perpetuities, or any other rule of law or equity (o).

CHAPTER X.

Charitable gifts.

Charitable gifts are an exception to the rule which forbids the creation of perpetuities, in the primary sense of the word (p). Consequently, if there is an absolute immediate gift for a charitable purpose which may last for ever, the gift is good (q). And this is so, even although the mode in which the property is to be applied depends on a future and uncertain event; thus where a testator declares his intention of devoting a fund to charity, and directs that when and so soon as land is available for building almshouses, the money shall be employed for that purpose, this is a good charitable gift, although land may never be available for the purpose (r). And on the theory that when property has once been taken out of commerce by being devoted to charity, it is immaterial to what particular kind of charity it is devoted, the rule has been established that property may be given to charity A., with a gift over, in an event which may never happen, to charity B. (s). But if a gift to charity is future or conditional, and may not take effect within the period allowed by the Rule against Remoteness (the modern Rule against Perpetuities) the gift is void (t).

Conditional
charity.

The exemption of charitable gifts from the rule forbidding the creation of perpetuities makes it possible to create indirectly a perpetuity for non-charitable purposes. Thus, if a testator gives a fund to the trustees of charity A., subject to a condition that they shall keep his family vault in good repair, with a proviso that on failure to comply with the condition the fund is to go to charity B., the condition and gift over are good (u). So a bequest to a charitable society, on condition that the committee of the society undertake in writing to the testator's executors to keep his tomb in repair, is good (v).

Municipal
corporations.

vested in A., subject to a right or interest presently vested in B., although that right or interest may not take effect in possession until the happening of an event which need not necessarily happen within a definite period, this does not constitute a perpetuity, because B. can at any time release his contingent interest, or A. can at any time sell the property subject to B.'s interest, or A. and B. together can at any time concur in disposing of the property (x). But this doctrine has been practically overruled by the dicta of the Court of Appeal in London & S. W. Railway v. Gomm (y), to the effect that an option of purchase in respect of land is invalid unless its exercise is restricted to the period allowed by the modern Rule against Perpetuities.

II.—The Old Rule against Perpetuities.—After estates tail were held to be barrable by common recovery, numerous attempts were made by landowners to create unbarrable entails by indirect means. One device was to insert in a settlement of land a proviso imposing a forfeiture or penalty on any tenant in tail who attempted to bar the entail; these provisos (called clauses of perpetuity) were held to be void (a), and in Mildmay's Case (b), where a similar question arose, the judges resolved “that all these perpetuities were against the reason and policy of the common law; for at common law all inheritances were fee simple, as Littleton saith . . . But the true policy and rule of the common law in this point was, in effect, overthrown by the statute De Donis Conditionalibus, made anno 13 Ed. I, which established a general perpetuity by act of parliament, for all who had or would make it, by force whereof all the possessions of England in effect were entailed accordingly . . . and the same continued . . . till about the 12th year of Ed. IV, when the judges on consultation had amongst themselves, resolved that an estate tail might be docked and barred by a common recovery.” Lord Bacon describes a perpetuity in the same way: “There is

(y) 20 Ch. D. 562. In that case the option was contingent, and not vested, being exerciseable only in an event which might not happen within the limits allowed by the modern Rule against Perpetuities: it was therefore clearly void for remoteness, and the statements of the learned judges as to the validity of a vested option of purchase, exerciseable immediately, are merely dicta. But the doctrine may be considered settled, as the principle laid down in L. & S. W. R. v. Gomm has been accepted without question for many years. See Woodall v. Clifton, [1905] 2 Ch. 257; Edwards v. Edwards, [1909] A. C. 275.

start up a device called perpetuity, which is an entail with a proviso conditional, tied to his estate, not to put away the land from his next heir, and if he do, to forfeit his own estate" (c). Another device was to create what was called a perpetual freehold, by limiting successive estates for life to the heirs or unborn issue of a person ad infinitum; this device also failed, for it was held that if a feoffment was made to the use of A. for life, and after to the use of every person that shall be his heir one after another for the term of the life of every such heir, "this limitation is merely void, for the limitation of an use to have a perpetual freehold is not agreeable with the rule of law in estates in possession" (d). The rule is stated in the same way in a standard work: "Uses that are against the rules of the common law shall not be executed by this statute [the Statute of Uses], and, therefore, if a feoffment be made to the use of A. for life, and after to the use of every person that shall be his heir one after another for term of his life . . . these uses shall not be executed, because these limitations are wholly void" (e). "It is against the rules of the common law that a perpetual freehold for life only should descend, because it creates a perpetuity" (f). A third device was to create a species of estate tail by means of an executory bequest of a term of years to a person and his heirs one after another ad infinitum, either directly or by way of trust; if such a limitation had been held legal it would have created a "perpetuity," because it could not be barred by a common recovery (g). Accordingly this device also failed (h), for the reason stated in Lampet's Case: "It would be inconvenient that such manner of perpetuity should be made of a chattel, when of an inheritance neither by act executed by the common law, nor by limitation of an use, nor by devises in last wills, any perpetuity can be established" (i).

forbade the limitation of successive life estates to the unborn descendants or heirs of a person ad infinitum? The Real Property Commissioners (Third Report, pp. 30, 31) say that there was, and this conclusion is, it is submitted, superabundantly justified by the authorities cited in the text [C. S.].

CHAPTER X.

Technical
"perpetuity."

Hence "perpetuity" came to have the special meaning of a limitation equivalent to, or in the nature of, an unbarrable entail. "A perpetuity is the settlement of an estate or an interest in tail, with such remainders expectant upon it as are in no sort in the power of the tenant in tail in possession to dock by any recovery or assignment" (j). "A perpetuity is where an estate is so designed to be settled in tail, &c., that it cannot be undone or made void" (k). "A perpetuity is the settlement of an interest descendable from heir to heir, so that it shall not be in the power of him in whom it is vested to dispose of it, or turn it out of the channel" (l).

It is necessary to dwell on this use of "perpetuity," because the meaning of the word has so completely changed that its use in this sense by Mr. Fearn and the judges and writers of the eighteenth century, and even later (m), is liable to cause misapprehension (n). The doctrine of cy-près is unintelligible, unless it is recognised as an indulgence granted to a testator who attempts to create an unbarrable entail (nn).

An attempt to create an unbarrable entail is ineffectual, even if it is restricted to a certain number of generations. This was the case in Seaward v. Willock (o), where the testator devised land to A. for life, and to his descendants down to the tenth generation during their lives (p).

perpetuity.

The law does not allow a "perpetuity" to be created by means of terms of years. This was attempted by the testators in Somerville v. Lethbridge (q) and Beard v. Westcott (r), in each of which cases successive terms of ninety-nine years, determinable on their lives, were given to the sons of A., a bachelor, and their issue male, and in

(n) Even Mr. Jarman did not fully grasp the change in the meaning of the word. "The early judges," he says, "had an extreme repugnance to every disposition of property that savoured of a perpetuity, but the expressions which occasionally fell from them, demonstrative of this feeling, did not afford a specific definition of the monster which the law was stated to 'abhor'" (1st edition, p. 220). If Mr. Jarman had referred to the cases cited above, and to Grig v. Hopkins (Sid. 37), he would have found that there was no ambiguity in the term "perpetuity" as used by the early judges. It is still more surprising to find so learned and accurate a writer as Mr. Gray misled by the change in the meaning of the term. He entirely misunderstands the case of Humberston v. Humberston, owing to his unwillingness to admit that in 1717 "perpetuity" still retained its meaning of a limitation in the nature of an unbarrable entail (Gray Perp., § 193, 2nd edition).

default of such issue to B., a living person : it was held that all the limitations after the life estate given to A.'s first son (who was unborn at the testator's death) were void as tending to a perpetuity (s).

A "perpetuity" cannot be created by means of a trust. "If in equity you could come nearer to a perpetuity than the rules of common law would admit, all men, being desirous to continue their estates in their families, would settle their estates by way of trust, which might indeed make well for the jurisdiction of Chancery, but would be destructive to the commonwealth" (t). Attempts to make entails practically unbarable by limiting long terms of years to trustees, and giving them powers of entry and raising money, &c., seem at one time to have been not uncommon, but every attempt of this kind was held void, as tending to a perpetuity (u). So if a testator devises land to A. B. in tail "upon special trust and confidence" that he will not bar the entail, this provision is wholly ineffectual (v).

is barrable.

The general rule of law on the subject was thus stated by James, L. J.: "If there is one thing that has been settled beyond all question in the real property law of this country, it is that no condition, no restriction, no prohibition, no limitation over, can prevent a tenant in tail from suffering a common recovery with all its consequences" (w).

Foreign
entail.

In Fordyce v. Bridges (x), a testator bequeathed personal estate upon trusts which might result in its being invested in the purchase of land in Scotland to be settled in strict entail, according to the law of that country, which apparently did not allow such estates to be barred, and it was objected that this would create a perpetuity according to English law, and was therefore void. It was, however, held by Lord Cottenham that "the rules acted upon by the Courts in this country with respect to testamentary dispositions tending to perpetuities, relate to this country only."

Whitby v.
Mitchell.

III.—The Rule in Whitby v. Mitchell.—In Whitby v. Mitchell (y), land was limited to an unborn person for life, with remainder to the children of that unborn person : it was held by Kay, J., and by the Court of Appeal, that the remainder to the children was bad. Some of the authorities—Hay v. Earl of Coventry (z), Monypenny v. Dering (a), and the opinions of Mr. Charles Butler and Mr. Joshua Williams—are referred to in the judgments, but still earlier and more instructive authority is to be found. Mr. Fearne, in 1776, explained the rule thus: “Any limitation in future, or by way of remainder, of lands of inheritance, which in its nature tends to a perpetuity (b), even although there be a preceding vested freehold, so as to take it out of the description of an executory devise, is by our Courts considered as void in its creation; as in the case of a limitation of lands in succession, first to a person in esse, and after his decease to his unborn children, and afterwards the children of such unborn children, this last remainder is absolutely void” (c).

Mr. Fearne's
of the rule.

Again, in 1759, in Duke of Marlborough v. Godolphin (d), where the testator devised lands to several persons successively for life, with remainder to their sons successively in tail male, and directed his trustees upon the birth of each son, to revoke the uses and to limit the land to such son for life, with remainder to his sons in tail male, it was held that the clause of revocation and resettlement was void, as tending to a perpetuity. Lord Northington pointed out that the law allows land to be tied up by limiting a contingent remainder to an unborn person for life, but does not permit a remainder to his issue.

The rule in Whitby v. Mitchell has been described as “the old common law rule against double possibilities which prevents a limitation of a legal estate in land to the unborn child of an unborn child of an existing person” (dd), but this is an inaccurate description of the rule, which is directed against limitations to two unborn generations in succession. Such a limitation as that referred to in the passage just cited is not invalid under the rule in Whitby v. Mitchell. For example, a limitation of land to A. for life, and after his death to the eldest grandchild of B., a bachelor, is perfectly good.

Erroneous
statement
of rule.

It is hardly necessary to say that the rule in Whitby v. Mitchell, being a rule applying only to contingent remainders, does not apply to limitations of personal estate; but the point was argued and decided in Re Bowles (e).

CHAPTER X.

executory
devises.

Whether it applies to equitable contingent
remainders.

The rule in Whitby v. Mitchell applies only to contingent remainders, and therefore does not apply to executory devises.

The question whether the rule applies to equitable contingent remainders, that is, to contingent remainders of equitable estates, has been recently raised, and is believed to be now (May, 1909) sub judice (d). It is submitted that the rule clearly does so apply. In his work on Contingent Remainders, Mr. Fearne, after giving his statement of the rule (ante, p. 285), goes on to cite the case of Humberston v. Humberston (post, p. 288), in which the limitations were equitable, as an illustration of the application of the rule. And in Monyppenny v. Dering (e), where the limitations were equitable, Lord St. Leonards said that the case was governed by the rule which "forbids the raising of successive estates by purchase to unborn children, that is, to an unborn child of an unborn child," thus clearly shewing that in his opinion the rule in Whitby v. Mitchell applies to equitable limitations. This result is also arrived at if the question is considered historically, for in Duke of Norfolk v. Howard, Sir Francis North said that if perpetuities (meaning unbarrable entails) could be created by way of trust, "all men, being desirous to continue their estates in their families, would settle their estates by way of trust" (f).

Effect of decision in Whitby v.
Mitchell.

The effect of the decision in Whitby v. Mitchell is to establish the correctness of the view held by Mr. Fearne and his followers, and to demonstrate the error into which Mr. Lewis and Mr. Gray fell when they denied the existence of the rule (g). The point is of importance, because it follows from the decision that Mr. Fearne and his followers are right, and that Mr. Lewis and Mr. Gray are wrong, in the views which they have expressed on the question whether contingent (d) Since these remarks were written the case (Re Nash) has been decided. See Addenda.

(e) 2 D. M. & G. at p. 170.

(f) The passage is cited supra, p. 284. It must be read in connection with the definition of "perpetuity" given by Lord Nottingham in the same case, cited supra, p. 283. The general principle was followed in Mainwaring v. Baxter, 5 Ves. 458.

(g) In the first edition of his work on Perpetuities, Mr. Gray strenuously denied that any such rule ever existed; he referred to it as "a non-existent rule based on an exploded theory." In the second edition, published since the decision in Whitby v. Mitchell, he adheres to that view. He is unable to see that the rule in Whitby v. Mitchell is merely an example or abbreviated statement of the general principle—laid down by the author of Sheppard's Touchstone and by Chief Baron Gilbert, and recognised by Lord Chancellor Cowper, Lord Northington, the Real Property Commissioners, Lord St. Leonards, and others—that life estates cannot be limited to unborn issue in succession beyond the first generation (supra, p. 282, and infra, p. 288).

remainders are subject to the modern Rule against Perpetuities. This question is discussed post, p. 368 (h).

CHAPTER X.

It was stated by Mr. Preston, arguendo, in Mogg v. Mogg (hh), that a limitation which falls within the rule in Whitby v. Mitchell is good if there is "a limitation of the time within which it is to take effect," and the statement was adopted as correct by Wood, V.-C., in Catlin v. Brown (i) although the question did not arise in that

Wood, V.-C., in Catlin v.
Brown.

(h) The origin of the rule in Whitby v. Mitchell has been the subject of much debate (the principal authorities are referred to in two articles in the Law Quarterly Review, xiv. 234, xv. 71; an article in the Solicitor's Journal, vol. xlix., p. 414; and an article in the Juridical Review for July 1906. See also Encycl. Laws of England, 2nd ed. iii. 519). It is submitted that the true explanation is that given by Lord Northington and Mr. Fearn in the passages quoted above, and that the rule is merely an example or specific application of the general principle which forbids the creation of a "perpetuity" in the old-fashioned sense of the word, namely, a limitation of land to successive unborn descendants as purchasers. It has been explained above (p. 282) that a limitation of successive life estates to unborn descendants ad infinitum is void, being a "perpetuity"; and a limitation of life estates to unborn descendants for a definite number of generations is also void, because it tends to a perpetuity (Seaward v. Willock, supra, p. 283). That this was the ordinary meaning of "perpetuity" at the time when Mr. Fearn wrote (1776) is clear from Chief Baron Gilbert's work on Uses (1734), in which he says that a perpetual succession of life estates descendable from heir to heir is void, being a perpetuity (supra, p. 283), and from the definition of "perpetuity" in Jacob's Law Dictionary (1739) as an estate "so designed to be settled in tail, &c., that it cannot be undone or made void." Mr. Lewis does indeed suggest (Perp. Supp. 121) that in referring to a "perpetuity" in the passage above quoted, Mr. Fearn had in mind the modern Rule against Perpetuities (infra, p. 370, note (x)); but this view is quite inadmissible, for in the first place Mr. Fearn expressly says that the modern Rule against Perpetuities does not apply to contingent remainders (post, p. 369, n. (j)), and in the second place, the kind of limitation forbidden by the rule in Whitby v. Mitchell is not necessarily bad under the modern Rule against Perpetuities: a limitation by way of executory devise to the issue of an unborn person to whom a preceding estate for life is given, is perfectly good if it is restricted to issue born within the period allowed by the modern Rule, while such a limitation by way of contingent remainder is, as Mr. Fearn tells us, "absolutely void." It is submitted that the explanation of the origin of the rule in Whitby v. Mitchell suggested (or rather taken for granted) by Mr. Fearn, the Real Property Commissioners, and the judges who took part in the decision in Monypenney v. Dering, is more simple and satisfactory than that which makes the rule in some way derived from the so-called rule against a possibility on a possibility. That no definite or intelligible rule against double possibilities ever existed, is admitted even by those who use it as some kind of explanation of the origin of the rule in Whitby v. Mitchell. (See the judgment of Lindley, L. J., in Whitby v. Mitchell, 44 Ch. D. at p. 92.) It is therefore to be regretted that the Court of Appeal in Whitby v. Mitchell should have referred to the so-called rule against double possibilities as the parent of the rule now under discussion. It may be said that the question of the true origin of the rule in Whitby v. Mitchell is an academic one, and of no practical importance, but this is not altogether true, for if the rule in Whitby v. Mitchell had been stated as a branch of the old rule forbidding the limitation of successive life estates in land to unborn generations, the question decided in Re Bowles could never have been raised. The point also has an important bearing on the question whether the rule applies to equitable contingent remainders [C. S.].

case. There is, however, no foundation for Mr. Preston's statement. No such qualification of the rule is to be found in any of the old authorities. On the contrary, Mr. Fearné expressly says that if land is limited to an unborn person for life, with remainder to the issue of that unborn person, this last remainder is "absolutely void." In the case cited by Mr. Preston as establishing his proposition (i), the land was not devised to two unborn generations in succession; the devise was to A. for life and after his death to his issue as he should appoint; he died without leaving issue, and the only question was whether the gift over was good. Mr. Gray approves of Mr. Preston's statement (j), but as he denies the accuracy of the decision in Whitby v. Mitchell, his opinion, on this particular point, can have no weight in our courts.

IV.—The Doctrine of Cy-près.—Although the law does not allow a testator to devise land to successive unborn generations as purchasers, the Courts have, in certain cases, endeavoured to carry out his intention by giving effect to the devise within the limits allowed by law. This is the doctrine of cy-près, or approximation, under which the limitation to the unborn descendants is converted into an estate tail (i). Thus, in Humberston v. Humberston (j), a testator devised lands to a corporation upon trust to convey them to M. Humberston for life, and after his death to his first son for life, and so to the first son of that first son for life, &c., with similar elaborate limitations by way of executory trust to a large number of persons: "both Court and counsel held that to be such an affectation and tendency to a perpetuity that nothing was said in support of it," and Lord Chancellor Cowper gave judgment as follows: "Though an attempt to make a perpetuity for successive lives be vain, yet so far as it is consistent with the rules of law it ought to be complied with; and, therefore, let all the sons of these several Humberstons, that are already born, take

(j) Perp. § 294.

(i) Mr. Lewis treats the doctrine of cy-près as an exception to the modern Rule against Perpetuities (Perp. Supp. 142), but this is an error, arising from Mr. Lewis's inability to understand the meaning of "perpetuity" as used by judges and writers in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries (ante, p. 283). No doctrine of cy-près has ever been engrafted on the modern Rule against Perpetuities; that Rule is unflinchingly applied without regard to the intention of the testator, and the fact that its application in a given case will defeat the testator's expressed intention, is not allowed to affect the construction of the will, unless the language of the will is ambiguous, so as to be capable of a construction which will carry out, and not defeat, the intention of the testator (post, p. 365).

estates for their lives ; but where the limitation is to the first son unborn, there the limitation to such unborn son shall be in tail male " (k). It was at one time supposed that the ground for this decision was that, the trust being executory, "the Court was authorised to mould the limitations so as to bring them within the established limits, independently of the doctrine in question" (l). But this is not strictly accurate, for the doctrine of cy-près is based on the presumed intention of the testator (m). In the case of an executory trust, however, greater latitude is allowed in moulding the limitations in order to carry out the intention of the testator than where he has been his own conveyancer (n).

Doctrine not restricted to executory trusts.

Being an anomaly, the doctrine of cy-près ought not to be extended (o).

Doctrine not to be extended. Who takes estate tail.

In all these cases where successive life estates are given to A. and his issue, A. takes a life estate, and his first descendant in the line of succession takes an estate tail (oo). There are cases, apparently similar to these, where the estate tail is given to A. (p), but the explanation seems to be that in the latter class of cases the effect of the will is to give A. an estate of inheritance, and the words which purport to give him and his issue estates for life are either taken to be words descriptive of an estate of inheritance, or they give A. an estate of inheritance coupled with a proviso that the successive tenants shall hold for life ; consequently A. takes an estate tail, not by cy-près, but by rejecting the words which are repugnant to an estate of inheritance (q).

(oo) In Forsbrook v. Forsbrook, L. R., 3 Ch. 99, where successive life estates were given to the testator's two nephews and their male issue, there was a direction that "each two of the succeeding inheritors" should inherit free from incumbrances, and this appears to have prevented the application of the cy-près doctrine; it was held that the nephews took life estates, with remainder to their eldest sons for their lives, with remainder to the nephews in tail male: the eldest sons were living at the testator's death. The L. J.J. followed the doctrine laid down in Doe v. Gallini, 3 Ad. & E. 340. As to the remark of Rolt, L. J., on the application of the doctrine of cy-près, see Gray, §§ 658 seq. CHAPTER X.

successive
to "issue."

In Parfitt v. Hember (r), the testator devised real estate upon trust for his brother A. for life, with remainder in trust for his nephews and niece B., C., and D., and the survivor, for their lives and the life of the survivor, and for the issue of them respectively for their lives for ever, as tenants in common, with a gift over on their death without issue, or in case of the death of all their issue, and directed that "the before-stated entails to my nephews and niece and their respective issue" should be equally divided "amongst the daughters as well as the sons of them, my nephews and nieces, and their issue." It was held by Romilly, M. R., that all the children of B., C., and D. took equitable estates as tenants in common in tail, with cross remainders.

In Re Richardson (s), the testator devised land to his three children by name, and directed that if any of them should die leaving issue, his share should go to his children for life in equal shares, "and so to be continued and distributed in a descending line per stirpes from issue to issue for life"; there was no gift over in default of issue. It was held by Buckley, J., that the cy-près doctrine did not apply, on the ground that the persons to benefit under the devise were a class larger than those who would take under an estate tail. The limitations were such that in passing from generation to generation it was not the heir in tail who was to take, but the heir in tail and all his brothers and sisters. "That is a direction hopelessly inconsistent with an estate tail" (t).

Doctrine
not applied where no general intent to create estate tail,

The doctrine is not applied where there is no general intent to create an estate tail. Thus, in Seaward v. Willock (u), the testator devised land to A. for life. "and after him to his eldest or any other son after him for life, and after them to as many of his descendants issue male as shall be heirs of his or their bodies, down to the tenth default of issue, was held to give A., B., and C. estates tail. The V.-C. refused to adopt the doctrine of cy-près applied in Humberston v. Humberston, because in the case before him the devise was direct and not by way of executory trust; but this was clearly erroneous: supra, p. 289. As to the decision in Wollen v. Andrewes, 2 Bing. 126, see Gray, § 657.

(t) The learned judge thought that Parfitt v. Hember was distinguishable, and that the decision in Humberston v. Humberston turned on the fact that the trusts were executory. But it is clear that the general rule laid down in Humberston v. Humberston applies to direct devises as well as to executory trusts (supra, note (m)), and in Parfitt v. Hember the key-note of the judgment is to be found in the opening sentence: "I think that in this will an intention is shewn to give a series of life estates in perpetuity to the issue of the nephews and nieces." Parfitt v. Hember was referred to with approval by Jessel, M. R., in Hampton v. Holman, 5 Ch. D. 183. The test is whether the estate, if left to itself, so as to go in the precise course marked out by the testator, will devolve as an estate tail; if so, the doctrine of cy-près is applicable: see Monypenny v. Dering (16 M. & W. at p. 428). See also Gray, Perp., § 652. (u) 5 East, 198.

generation during their natural lives": as this limitation was not to the descendants of A. ad infinitum, it was held that A. took an estate for life only.

CHAPTER X.

Nor is it applied where successive terms of years, determinable on death, are given to unborn issue (v).

In a case where land was directed to be purchased and settled on a person and his descendants for successive life estates (such person to be ascertained on the failure of a previous estate tail), and the person so to be ascertained was not born at the death of the testator, it was held that the trust could not be executed (w). The case of Humberston v. Humberston was cited in argument, but the doctrine of cy-près was not referred to in the judgments.

The case in which the question of the application of the doctrine most frequently arises is where an estate tail is expressly given. The doctrine of cy-près, as Mr. Jarman explains (x), "applies where lands are limited to an unborn person for life, with remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail, in which case, as such limitations are clearly incapable of taking effect in the manner intended (the remainder to the issue being, as we have seen, absolutely void), the doctrine in question gives to the parent the estate tail that was designed for the issue; which estate tail (unless barred by the parent or his issue being tenant in tail for the time being) will comprise, in its devolution by descent, all the persons intended to have been made tenants in tail by purchase. The intention that the testator's bounty shall flow to the issue, is considered as the main and paramount design, to which the mere mode of their taking is subordinate and the latter is therefore sacrificed (y). The first clear (z) authority

(v) Beard v. Westcott, 5 Taunt. 393, 5 B. & Ald. 801, T. & R. 25; Somerville v. Lethbridge, 6 T. R. 213. In the first edition of this work (p. 263) Mr. Jarman said on the authority of the three cases last cited: "It has been decided in relation to the doctrine in question . . . that it is inapplicable where an attempt is simply made to limit a succession of life estates to the issue of an unborn person, either for a definite or indefinite series of generations." It will be seen that the cases in question are not authorities for this proposition.

(y) Mr. Jarman's statement of the ground of the rule will be found confirmed by the Court of Exchequer in Monypenny v. Dering, 16 Mee. & W. at p. 428, and by Jessel, M. R., in Hampston v. Holman, 5 Ch. D. 190.

(z) After referring to the case of Humberston v. Humberston (supra, p. 288), Mr. Jarman remarks: "Chapman d. Oliver v. Brown, 3 Burr. 1626, 3 B. P. C. Toml. 269, cited Butl. Fea. C. R. 207, n., is also distinguishable (though the doctrine was much discussed), as there was an express devise in tail to the unborn son, and the only question was, whether words ought not to be supplied which would have given the estate tail to the son of such son, and thereby rendered the devise void. This was refused, and, consequently, the devise was held to be good."

for the doctrine is Nicholl v. Nicholl (a), where the devise was 'to the second son of W. Nicholl (who at the death of the testator had no son) for his life, and after his death, or in case he should inherit the paternal estate by the death of his elder brother, to his second son lawfully to be begotten and his heirs male, remainder to the third and other sons of W. Nicholl successively, according to priority of birth, in tail male, remainder over.' The Common Pleas, on a case sent from Chancery, certified that the estate would vest in the second son [when born, of W. Nicholl] by executory devise; and that in order to effectuate the general intention of the testator, he would take an estate in tail male, determinable on the accession of the paternal estate.

"So, in Robinson v. Hardcastle (b), where, on the marriage of A. and B., lands were limited to A. for life, remainder to such of the children of the marriage as A. should appoint, and, in default, over. A. by will appointed to his son for life, with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to the first and other sons of such son successively in tail male, with remainder to his daughters as tenants in common in tail. Mr. Justice Buller expressed an opinion that the son, by the application of the cy-près doctrine, took an estate tail; but the Court was not called upon to decide the point.

Jackson.*

"The case, however, which has carried this doctrine farther than any other, is Pitt v. Jackson (c), where, by a settlement on the marriage of P. W., certain moneys were directed to be laid out in the purchase of lands, to be settled to the use of P. W. for life, without impeachment of waste, with remainder to his intended wife for life, remainder to the use of the children of the marriage, subject to such powers, limitations, and provisos as P. W. by deed or will should appoint, with remainders over. By will P. W. appointed trust moneys to be laid out in real estate, to be conveyed in trust for his daughter M., during her life, for her separate use, remainder to trustees to support contingent remainders, remainder to all and every the child and children of his said daughter, as tenants in common in tail, with remainders over. Sir Lloyd Kenyon, M. R., declared the appointment to be invalid, and that the whole of the share appointed

"In this case, the nature of the estate appointed to the children, differed widely from the mode of its devolution under an estate tail, which this doctrine gave to their parent. In all the preceding cases, the first and other sons were to take successively; here, all the children, female as well as male, were to take concurrently. Probably the authority of Pitt v. Jackson is not to be implicitly relied on; even the eminent judge who decided it, on a subsequent occasion, admitted that it went to the outside of the rules of construction, adding, however, that still he did not think it was wrong (d). Lord Eldon, in quoting this observation (e), intimated that it was not proper to go one step further; for those cases, in order to serve the general intent and the particular intent, destroyed both." However, Pitt v. Jackson was approved by Lord St. Leonards (f), and was followed by Sir J. Wigram, V.-C., under precisely similar circumstances, in Vanderplank v. King (g).

But although the mode and form of the provision intended by the will may be altered by the application of this rule of construction, no person or line of persons may be introduced for whom no provision whatever was intended. Therefore, in Monypenny v. Dering (h), it was held by Lord St. Leonards that the first son of P. M. could not be held to take an estate tail, because such an estate would in regular succession, and after failure of the eldest son and his issue, descend to the second and other sons of such first son, for whom the will made no provision (i).

In Vanderplank v. King (j), the question arose, whether the cy-près doctrine could be applied to some of a class and not to others. The testator devised lands to his daughter (who was living at his decease) for her life, with remainder to all her children (as it was decided) as tenants in common for their lives, with remainder to the grandchildren per stirpes in tail, with cross remainders between the grandchildren of each stock, and also (as it was held) between each stock of grandchildren. The testator's daughter had several children living at his death, to whom alone estates for life with remainder to their issue could be legally limited; one child named Matilda was born after the testator's decease, the remainder to whose issue was void, being an attempt to create a perpetuity, and Sir J. Wigram, V.-C., decided that the cy-près doctrine was to be applied to the share of Matilda, and that she took an estate tail, but that it was not necessary similarly to modify the estates limited in the shares of the other children; Matilda, in fact, was made to stand in the same position as a single child of hers would have done, under the will and apart from the perpetuity rule, she being dead.

confined to
limitations.

The doctrine in question is not confined to the first set of limitations requiring modification, but is extended to all that follow. Thus, in Hopkins v. Hopkins (k), a testator devised lands in trust for I. H. for life, with remainder to S. H., son of I. H., for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of S. H. successively in tail male, and for want of such issue, in case I. H. should have any other son or sons, then in trust for all and every of such other son and sons respectively and successively for their respective lives, with like remainders to their several sons successively and respectively as were thereinbefore limited to the issue male of the said S. H., with remainders over. S. H. died in the testator's lifetime without issue, and I. H. never had any other son, so that it was necessary to apply the cy-près doctrine to the limitations to his other sons for life, with remainder to their issue, the remainder to such issue being too remote; and as the remainders over were held good, it is clear that it was considered that not only the second, but the third and every other son of I. H. would, under the doctrine in question, have taken an estate tail.

applies to personalty.

It follows from the nature and history of the doctrine of cy-près that it cannot be fully applied to limitations of personal estate (l). But the principle of carrying out the general intention of a testator is applied to such cases as far as possible. Thus, in Mackworth v. Hinxman (m), personalty was bequeathed so as to follow a baronetcy, and it was held that, in order to accomplish the testator's intention, the first successor to the title took a quasi-entail, and that the personalty became his absolute property. So in Re Johnson's Trusts (n), the trustees of a will were directed to pay the income of personal property to the person for the time being entitled to the rents and profits of the freehold hereditaments devised by the same will in strict settlement: it was held that the personal estate vested absolutely in the first tenant in tail.

Whether the doctrine applies to a mixed fund does not seem to have been decided (o). Mixed fund.

It is settled that the doctrine is not applicable where the limitation to the children of the unborn persons gives them an estate in fee simple. This was decided in Bristow v. Warde (p), where money directed to be laid out in land was, by the trusts of certain articles, and a settlement executed in pursuance of those articles, made subject to a power of appointment by the husband, in favour of the children of the marriage; and he appointed portions of the fund to certain of the children for life, and after their decease, among their children, as they should appoint; it was held to be real estate, and that the husband's appointment (which, if valid, would have the effect of vesting absolute interests in the grandchildren equally, in default of appointment by the children), was void as to the grandchildren, and could not, as Lord Loughborough was of opinion, be executed cy-près (q).

V.—Executory Limitations on Failure of Issue.—Under executory limitations of this kind, land could formerly be tied up for a longer period than was possible by means of an ordinary entail. Thus, under a devise to A. in fee simple, and if he die without issue living at his death then to B. in fee simple, and if he die without issue living at his death, then to C. in fee simple, and so on, it was impossible for A. to dispose of the land without the concurrence of B., C., &c., although under an ordinary strict settlement in tail, A. and his eldest son could have barred the entail at any time after the son came of age. In order to prevent this result, the Conveyancing Act, 1882, enacts (sect. 10) that where a person is entitled to land with an executory limitation over on default or failure of all or any of his issue, that executory limitation shall become void and incapable of taking effect as soon as there is living any issue who has attained twenty-one of the class on default or failure of which the limitation over was to take effect (r).

to be considered is of comparatively recent growth, for although the necessity of imposing some check on the creation of future interests in real and personal property, of a kind unknown to the common law, began to be felt shortly after the modern modes of settling property by means of uses, trusts, and executory devises and bequests were introduced (s), it was not until 1833 that the terms of the rule were definitely settled (t), and even at the present day the precise limits of its scope and application are a matter of doubt.

Rule stated.

(A) THE RULE STATED (v).—Subject to the exceptions to be presently mentioned, no contingent or executory interest in property can be validly created, unless it must necessarily vest within the maximum period of one or more lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards. Consequently, a devise or bequest not falling within one of those exceptions, is void if it is to take effect on the

(s) "It was soon perceived," says Mr. Jarman, "that when increased facilities were given to the alienation of property, and modes of disposition unknown to the common law arose, from the introduction of springing uses and executory devises, which no act of the owner of the preceding estate could defeat, it was necessary to confine the power of creating these interests within such limits as would be adequate to the exigencies of families, without transgressing the bounds prescribed by a sound public policy. This was effected, not by legislative interference, but by the courts of judicature, who, in this instance, appear to have trodden very closely on the line which divides the judicial from the legislative functions" (1st edition, p. 220). The origin of the Rule is somewhat obscured by the ambiguity of the word "perpetuity," but there is no doubt that the Rule was originally directed against attempts made to create unbarred entails by means of executory bequests of terms of years; these being indestructible by common recovery, feoffment, or the like, the Courts were at first disposed to hold that any bequest of a term to take effect on the failure of the issue of a given person was bad, as tending to create a perpetuity in the old-fashioned sense of the word (supra, p. 283), even if the failure was limited to the period of a life in being (Child v. Baylie, Cro. Jac. 459, Palm. 333). It was not until the Duke of Norfolk's Case (3 Ch. Ca. 1) that the principle expressed by the modern Rule against Perpetuities—that the validity of an executory devise or bequest depends upon its remoteness in time, and not upon the character of the contingency—was established. See Gray, Perp., Ch. V.; also Mr. Hargrave's argument in the Thellusson Case, cited with approval by Mr. Butler in the note to Fearne's C. R. 429. But there arose this curious anomaly, that while executory bequests of terms of years became subject to the new Rule against Perpetuities, they remained subject to the old Rule, for it had long been settled that land could no more be limited to the unborn issue of a person in succession, as purchasers, for more than one generation, by means of terms of years, than by means of contingent remainders. It is not to be wondered at that this overlapping of the two Rules should have given rise to much confusion of thought.

(t) Cadell v. Palmer, 1 Cl. & F. 372.

(v) Mr. Gray remarks, with great truth, that the name given to the Rule has caused much confusion and misconception, because it implies that the Rule is directed against the kind of perpetuity which is forbidden by the Rules above stated (ss. I. and II. of this chapter). "It would have been better," he says, "had it been called the Rule against Remoteness" (Perp. § 2). It is not clear when the Rule first came to be known as the Rule against Perpetuities: Mr. Fearne carefully distinguishes between "remoteness" and "perpetuity," although he refers them both, with perfect correctness, to the general principle of law which forbids the creation of inalienable interests.

happening of an event at some indefinite future time (w), or within a fixed period exceeding twenty-one years; for it is not necessary that the period within which the interest is to vest should be limited with reference to a life.

Nor is it necessary that the life or lives specified in the limitation should be those of persons taking an interest in the property (x); and the number of lives which the testator is allowed to specify is only limited by the requirement that it must be possible to ascertain who they are, and obtain evidence of their death. It is true that in some of the cases it is laid down that an indefinite number of lives may be taken (y), but this must be understood to mean the lives of named persons (z). The true rule is laid down by Macdonald, C. B., in Theellusson v. Woodford (a), where he says that any number of lives may be taken, "the extinction of which could be proved without difficulty," and that where attempts are made to tie up property "during the lives of all the individuals who compose very large societies or bodies of men," such limitations "will be put to the usual test, whether they will or will not tend to a perpetuity, by rendering it almost, if not quite, impracticable to ascertain the extinction of the lives described, and will be supported or avoided accordingly." "The language of all the cases is, that property may be so limited as to make it inalienable during any number of lives, not exceeding that, to which testimony can be applied, to determine when the survivor of them drops" (b). It is submitted that the trusts in Re Moore (c) were clearly void within the Rule.

taken.

It is also submitted that the form of restricted gift commonly adopted in recent years, namely, a gift to take effect at the expiration of twenty-one years from the death of the last living descendant of Queen Victoria, is of doubtful validity, for, as many of these persons are the issue of marriages in foreign countries, and live abroad, it would be practically impossible to prove when the period expires.

It is hardly necessary to say that, for the purposes of the Rule, "life" means the life of a human being (d). "Life" must be human.

CHAPTER X.

Commencement of period.

Every person whose life is specified as forming part of the period allowed by the Rule must be in existence at the death of the testator, a child en ventre sa mère being deemed to be in existence for the purposes of the Rule (d). If no life is specified, then the period of twenty-one years is calculated from the death of the testator. In any case, the period of twenty-one years is to be taken as a term in gross, without reference to the infancy of any person. A period is allowed for gestation only in those cases where gestation actually exists (e).

gestation.

Mr. Jarman thus states the law with reference to the period of gestation (f): "A possible addition of the period of gestation to a life and twenty-one years, occurs in the ordinary case of a devise or bequest to A. (a person of the male sex) for life, and after his death to such of his children as shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or, indeed, in the case of a devise or bequest simply to the children of A. (a male) who shall attain majority, though not preceded by a life interest; in either case A. may die leaving a wife enceinte, and, as such child would not acquire a vested interest until his majority, the vesting would be postponed until the period of twenty-one years beyond a life in being, with the addition, it might be, of nine or ten months; and if, to either of these supposititious cases, we add the circumstance that A., the parent, were (as of course he might be) an infant en ventre sa mère at the testator's decease, there would be gained a double period for gestation (namely), one at the commencement, and another at an intermediate part of the period of postponement. To treat the period of gestation, however, as an adjunct to the lives, is not, perhaps, quite correct. It seems more proper to say that the rule of law admits of the absolute ownership being suspended for a life or lives in being, and twenty-one years afterwards, and that, for the purposes of the rule, a child en ventre sa mère is considered as a life in being" (g).

Vesting cannot be postponed for a gross term exceeding twenty-one years.

Where the vesting of a gift is postponed for a fixed term exceeding twenty-one years, the gift is unquestionably void, although not preceded by a life; for the fact of the testator not having availed (f) First edition, p. 222.

(g) The doctrine thus stated by Mr. Jarman has been established by the decision in Re Wilmer's Trusts, [1903] 1 Ch. 874, 2 Ch. 411.

In Re Wass ([1882] W. N. 158) there was a gift to such of the children of A. as should be living at the time of the testator's decease or born in due time thereafter: it was held by Kay, J., that the words "born in due time" did not refer to the period of gestation. Sed quere.

himself of the allowance of a life does not enable him to take a larger number of years. Thus, in Palmer v. Holford (h), where a testator bequeathed a sum of stock upon trust to raise an accumulated fund, and to transfer such fund to the children of his son C. T. H., who should be living at the expiration of twenty-eight years from the testator's decease, except an eldest or only son; and in case no such child should be then living, then over; Sir J. Leach, M. R., said: "The expressed intention of the testator is that all the children of his son C. T. H., other than an eldest son, should take who were living at the expiration of twenty-eight years, and that no person should take before that period. If C. T. H. had such children born to him at any time within seven years from the testator's death, then the vesting of the interests of such children who were unborn at the death of the testator would have been suspended for more than twenty-one years, and the gift, therefore, is too remote and void; and the gifts over not being to take effect until after the same period, which is too remote, are necessarily void also."

"The principle of this case," says Mr. Jarman (i), "clearly would apply where any, the most inconsiderable, addition was made to the term of twenty-one years; therefore a devise to such of the grandchildren of the testator as should be living at the expiration of twenty-one years and one day from the testator's decease, would clearly be void."

But care must be taken to distinguish those cases in which the gift is limited to persons living at the testator's death. Thus in Lachlan v. Reynolds (j) the testator gave his property upon certain trusts for his wife and children, and when thirty years were expired he ordered it to be sold and two thirds to be divided amongst his children then living; it was held that the trust was good.

If vesting depends on an event which may possibly happen after the expiration of the period allowed by the Rule, the gift is void, however improbable it may be that the event should happen after that period, and even if it does in fact happen within the period. Thus, in Hodson v. Ball (k), a gift over of a share of any child of the testator, in case of failure of its issue at any time during the life of the child's husband or wife, was held void; since the husband or wife might be a person not born at the testator's death, and might survive the child more than twenty-one years, and the gift over would thus take effect after the expiration of a life and twenty-one years. Again, a gift to such of the children and grandchildren of A. (a married woman having children living) as attain twenty-one, is void for remoteness, however old A. may be, and although in fact all her children and grandchildren attain twenty-one within the period allowed by the Rule, for the law will not assume that she may not have a child born a year after the testator's death, in which case, of course, a child of that child could not attain twenty-one within the period allowed by the Rule; consequently, evidence that A. is past the age of child-bearing is not admissible (j). So where a testator directed his trustees to carry on his business of a gravel contractor until his freehold gravel pits were worked out, and then upon trust to sell them and hold the proceeds of sale in trust for such child or children of his "then living" and such issue living of any child or children then deceased as should attain twenty-one, these trusts were held void, although it appeared that the pits were almost worked out at the testator's death, and were, in fact, worked out a few years afterwards (k).

In deciding the question of remoteness, the state of circumstances at the date of the testator's death, and not their state at the date of the will, is to be regarded. Thus, if a testator bequeaths money in trust for A. for life, and after his death for such of his children as shall attain the age of twenty-five, the latter trust would be void if the testator were to die before A.; yet if A. should die before the testator leaving children, of whatever age, the trust will be good, since it must of necessity vest or fail within lives in being, viz., the lives of the children (l). Again, if a testator has, under a settlement, a special power of appointment among his children, and by his will appoints the property to his daughters who shall survive him and attain twenty-four, and his youngest daughter is more than three years old at the time of his death, the appointment is good (m).

(m) Von Brockdorff v. Malcolm, 30 Ch. D. 172; Re Thompson, [1906] 2 Ch. 199, stated infra, p. 318.

This rule is of importance where the donee of a power to appoint to children wishes to give a child a life interest, followed by a general testamentary power of appointment (n).

The application of the Rule to charitable gifts, and to gifts to private persons to take effect after the failure or determination of a charitable gift, is discussed post, p. 366.

Charitable gifts.

A future interest is not obnoxious to the Rule if it begins within the proper period, although it may end beyond it (o) ; in which case, if it is a limited interest, it may tie up the property for more than twenty-one years beyond a life in being. Thus, if property is given upon trust for the unborn children of A. until the youngest attains twenty-one, and then upon trust for all of them during their lives, this is good (p). So, if property is given upon trust for A. for life, and after his death upon trust to pay the income to his children equally until the youngest attains twenty-five, this trust is good (q). But if the trust were a discretionary one, for the maintenance of any child or children of A. until the youngest attained twenty-five, and for the accumulation of surplus income, it would be bad, because no child would take a vested interest within the period allowed by the Rule (r). Limitations of this kind arise chiefly in the case of gifts to unborn persons, and the subject is therefore discussed in detail in a subsequent part of this chapter (s), where also the question of the validity of limitations following a gift of this nature is referred to.

Future interest may extend beyond the period allowed by the Rule.

On the same principle, if a remainder or reversionary interest is vested, that is, if it is ready to take effect whenever and however the particular estate determines, it is immaterial that the particular estate is determinable by a contingency which may fall beyond a life or lives in being (t). Thus, if property is given to the eldest child of A., a bachelor, for life, or until he or she shall become a Roman Catholic, and subject as aforesaid to the other children of A. absolutely, and A., after the death of the testator, has three children, X., Y., and Z., here Y. and Z. take vested interests, and the gift in remainder to them is good (u). But if in such a case the gift over is in favour of a class which cannot be ascertained until the particular estate determines, the gift over is void for remoteness (v). And if the gift over is dependent on a preceding gift which fails for remoteness, the gift over shares its fate (w).

It sometimes happens that a gift which appears to transgress the Rule is valid, because the interests created, although in form contingent, are really vested. Thus, an immediate gift to the children of A. who attain the age of twenty-five is good, if one of them has attained that age before the testator's death (x). So in Fox v. Fox (y), a testator directed his trustees to raise a sum of 15,000*l.*, and after the determination of certain life interests to divide and transfer one-fifth of the fund to and amongst the children of T. equally, as and when they should respectively attain the age of twenty-five years, applying from time to time the income of the presumptive share of each child, or so much thereof as the trustees might think proper, for his and her maintenance and education until such share should become payable as aforesaid; but if T. should leave no children him surviving, or if he should leave children and they should all die before attaining the age of twenty-five years, then over: it was held that, under the doctrine referred to in a subsequent part of this work (z), the children of T. took vested interests, and consequently that the gift to them was not void for remoteness (a).

Whether the modern Rule against Perpetuities does or does not apply to contingent remainders (a question discussed infra, p. 368), it is well settled that there is a distinction between executory devises and legal contingent remainders in this respect, that a limitation may be good as a contingent remainder, although it would have been void as an executory devise. Thus, if land is devised to A., a bachelor, for life, with remainder to such son of his as first attains twenty-five, this remainder is good, because it must vest, if at all, on A.'s death, that is, within the period allowed by the Rule. This apparent exception to the Rule is discussed in connection with gifts to classes (b).

not followed in Dewar v. Brooke (14 Ch. D. 529) and in Re Wintle ([1896] 2 Ch. 711). In Re Mervin ([1891] 3 Ch. 197), Stirling, J., thought that the decision in Fox v. Fox turned on the direction to apply the income of each child's share for his or her maintenance. In Re Gosling ([1903] 1 Ch. 448) the shares were held to be vested, but the question of remoteness did not arise.

Contingent remainders of trust or equitable estates are not governed by the same rule as contingent remainders of legal estates; for they do not necessarily vest or fail upon the determination of the previous estate, but await the happening of the contingency on which they are limited (c), and are, therefore, invalid if that contingency be too remote (d). But, like executory devises, they are good after an estate tail, if limited on an event which must necessarily happen at or before the determination of that estate, as in the case of a trust for a class to be ascertained at or before such determination (e).

CHAPTER X.

As to contingent limitations by way of remainder in equitable interests.

If a vested interest in property is given to a person, with a direction that payment or possession shall be postponed for a period beyond the limits allowed by the Rule, this direction, being inoperative, does not affect the validity of the gift. Thus, where (f) lands were devised to trustees and their heirs, in trust for A. for life, remainder in trust for B. for life, remainder unto and among all and every the issue, child and children of B. as should be living at the time of the decease of the survivors of A. and B., to be divided, share and share alike, when and as they should respectively attain the age of twenty-four years, and to their respective heirs, &c., and if only one, then the whole to such only or surviving child in fee upon attaining the said age: it was contended that the gift to the children was too remote; but the Court of C. P., on a case from Chancery, certified that the children living at the death of the survivor took vested interests.

On the same principle, if a testator directs the income of his property to be accumulated until it produces the sum of "3000*l*. or thereabouts," and then to hold it in trust for A., B., C., and D. during their lives, and after the death of the survivor upon trust for their issue, these trusts are not void for remoteness, because the issue take vested interests on the death of the last tenant for life, and if the fund has not then reached 3000*l.*, they can stop the accumulation (g).

Question whether gift is contingent, or vested subject to being divested.

Where, however, there is a direction that payment or possession shall be postponed, "it is often," as Mr. Jarman points out (gg), "a matter of no inconsiderable difficulty, from the ambiguity of the testator's language, to determine whether the postponement applies to the vesting or only to the enjoyment; and if the original gift is followed by a clause disposing of the shares of objects dying under the specified age, a further and still more perplexing question arises; namely, whether the vesting is originally deferred until the prescribed age, or the shares are immediately vested, with a liability to be divested; in other words, whether the specified age is the period of vesting or the period of the shares becoming absolute, in case of the objects dying before such age (h). This question, which is fully discussed in a future chapter (i), is most important in reference to the application of the Rule against Perpetuities, for if the shares are immediately vested, and the remoteness affects only the clauses of accruer, or other the gifts engrafted on or limited in derogation of the original gift, the effect of the Rule is not to invalidate such original gift, but to render it absolute, by relieving it from the clauses which qualified or divested the interests of its objects" (j).

The question whether a gift is contingent on the happening of a remote event, and therefore void under the Rule, or whether it is vested subject to being divested, and therefore good, most frequently arises in the case of gifts to children and other classes (k).

the chapter which treats of the vesting of estates, where, accordingly, they will be found. Vide Doe d. Roake v. Nowell, 1 M. & Sel. 327, 5 Dow, 202; and other cases, post; also *Vaudry v. (j) See the cases cited above, p. 303. As to the invalidity of modifying and qualifying clauses, see post, p. 361. A modifying or qualifying clause may be void on the ground that it is repugnant to the nature of an absolute interest: see Chap. XVII.

(k) See sub-sect. (E) of this chapter, and Chap. XLII.

CHAPTER X.

If a future interest is vested, it is immaterial that the particular interest which precedes it is determinable by a contingency which may happen beyond the limits allowed by the Rule. Thus, if property is given to an unborn person until he dies or changes his name, and then to B., a living person, B. has a vested interest, for he will take the property whether the tenant for life dies or changes his name, although the determination of his life interest is contingent on an event which may not take place within the period allowed by the Rule (l).

Where vested interest may not come into possession until after period allowed by Rule.

If the persons to whom a gift is made may not be ascertained within the required limits, the gift is too remote, although all the persons who can possibly claim under the gift must be determined within those limits, and a conveyance by them would, therefore, pass the entire interest (m). It was indeed formerly supposed, that if property were limited in such a way that all the persons in whom it must ultimately vest were ascertained within the period allowed by the Rule, so that they could together dispose of it absolutely before the expiration of that period, the limitation would be good, although their individual interests might possibly not be ascertained within the period; but it is now settled that this consideration does not prevent the application of the Rule (n).

Interests must be ascertained within period.

A contingent gift of a transmissible interest to a living person is bad if it may not vest within the period allowed by the Rule (o). But a gift to a living person, if living at the end of forty-nine years, or to his issue if he be then dead leaving issue, must take effect, if at all, within the limits allowed by the Rule, and is therefore good (p). Whether a gift to an existing person for his life is good, although preceded by interests which are void for remoteness, is discussed later (q).

Gift to living person may be too remote.

It has been decided that the Rule applies to restrictions on alienation; as, for example, where property is given to an unborn woman with a restraint on anticipation (r). Thus, in Re Teague's

(r) This extension of the Rule, as Mr. Gray points out (§§ 118a seq.), has arisen from a mistaken theory of the true nature of the Rule, but it is too firmly established to be shaken.

CHAPTER X.

Settlement (s), a widow having under her marriage settlement a power of appointment among the children of the marriage, appointed a share of the fund to one of her daughters without power of anticipation: it was held that the appointment was good, but that the restraint upon anticipation was void for remoteness.

The cases in which a gift has been held to be absolute, and therefore good, notwithstanding a subsequent direction that it shall be held upon trusts which are too remote, are referred to in a subsequent part of this chapter (t).

divisible.

Where property is given to a class, with a direction that the share of each member shall be subject to a restraint on alienation, the restraint may be good in the case of some members of the class, and bad in the case of the others. The cases in which a direction to settle the shares of members of a class has been held good as regards those who are in esse at the death of the testator, are referred to in a subsequent part of this chapter (u). So in a gift of property to a class, a restraint on anticipation may be good as regards those members of the class who are in esse when the gift takes effect (v). In Re Millward (w), a restraint on anticipation imposed on the members of a class consisting of the testator's grandchildren, was held good during the existence of the prior life interests.

of Rule.

If property is given to A., with a proviso that on the happening of an event which need not necessarily happen within the limits of the Rule, the property shall go over to B., the proviso is void, and A. takes absolutely. Thus, in Harding v. Nott (x), the testator devised a term of years to his son R., subject to a proviso that if R. or his issue male should become entitled to a certain estate, the term should go over to X.; R.'s issue male became entitled to the estate, but it was held that the term did not go over, the proviso being bad for remoteness. So in Hobbs v. Parsons (y), there was a gift to the children of A. and B., with a gift over on death under twenty-two: it was held that the divesting clause was void. Re Edmondson's Estate (z) is a similar decision. But if the gift over must take effect, if at all, within the period allowed by the Rule, it is good. Thus, in Re Turney (a), where a testator bequeathed a fund to A. for life, and after his death to his children absolutely on their attaining twenty-five, with a proviso that if any child died under twenty-five the share of that child should go to B., it was held (on the principle stated elsewhere (b) that the children took vested interests, subject to their being divested in the case of any children who did not attain twenty-five.

On the principle that vested interests are beyond the scope of the Rule, it is submitted that there is no foundation for the view, which appears to be held by some text-writers and practitioners, that the gift of a term of years, to commence at a fixed date beyond the period allowed by the Rule, is void for remoteness. A term of years to commence in futuro is a vested interest. Such a term was certainly not open to objection on the score of remoteness in the year 1837 (c), and nothing has happened since then to alter the law. The case of Beard v. Westcott (cc) is sometimes cited as bearing on this point; but in that case reversionary terms of years were devised to the male issue of A. in succession, with the intention of creating an unbarrable entail; the limitations to the issue after the first generation were void under the old Rule against Perpetuities (supra, p. 281).

term of years.

(B) TRUSTS AND POWERS.—The operation of the Rule is not confined to beneficial interests, but extends also to trusts and powers. Thus if lands are devised in strict settlement, with a direction to the trustees in certain events to revoke the limitations and resettle the lands in favour of persons beyond the limits of the Rule, this direction is void (d). So a trust for sale is bad if it cannot (or may not) arise until after the period allowed by the Rule (e). But an immediate trust for sale (if the beneficiaries to take under it must be ascertained within due limits of time) is not void for remoteness, although no limit is put to the time within which it may be not have been effected by a limitation of the legal estate (which would admittedly have been void under the old rule forbidding the creation of perpetuities, supra, pp. 283-5), it could not be effected by means of a trust or power. Mainwaring v. Baxter, 5 Ves. 458, was decided on the same principle.

CHAPTER X.

Discretionary trust.

exercised; as soon as the beneficiaries attain vested interests they can insist on the trust being carried out, unless they elect to take the property in specie (f).

A discretionary trust seems to be similar to a power of appointment; that is to say, if it can only be exercised within the limits of the Rule it is good, but if it can be exercised beyond those limits it is bad (g). Thus, a discretionary trust for the benefit of the unborn children of A. during their lives, with a trust to accumulate the unapplied income, is bad, because, until the discretion is exercised, no child has a vested right, and if the discretion were exercised beyond the limits of the Rule, an infringement of it would necessarily result (h).

But if there is a gift to a class of unborn persons not in itself too remote, with a separate power giving the trustees a discretion as to the application of the income during a period beyond the limits of the Rule, it seems that the original gift would be good, and only the discretionary trust bad (i).

Trusts for accumulation.

Trusts for accumulation of income are subject to special restrictions and exemptions. As a general rule, a trust for accumulation beyond the limits allowed by the Rule is bad (j), independently of the Thellusson Act (k). But trusts for accumulation to pay debts or mortgages are not within the mischief of the Rule (l). And where property is given to a person absolutely, with a superadded direction to accumulate the income beyond the limits allowed by the Rule, the direction may be disregarded, on the ground that it is an illegal restraint on ownership (m). But, of course, this principle does not apply where the vesting is postponed until the expiration of the period of accumulation (n).

Failure of trust need not affect beneficial interests.

It may happen that a trust is bad, and that the persons intended to be benefited by it are, nevertheless, entitled to the property. Thus, in Re Daveron (o), a testator devised a freehold house to trustees, subject to a lease which had forty-nine years unexpired, upon trust to pay the rent arising therefrom, so long as the lease should run, to certain named persons: and, "upon the expiration of the lease," he directed that the freehold should be sold, and the proceeds thereof distributed in thirds among certain other named persons, ascertainable within the limits of the Rule. It was held that, notwithstanding the invalidity of the trust for sale, the legatees of the proceeds of sale were entitled to the benefits intended for them by the testator, by taking the property as real estate. If, however, an immediate trust is created, but it is possible that no equitable interest under it may arise within the limits of the Rule, the whole trust is bad (p).

In executing an executory trust, the Court will, if possible, mould the limitations in such a way as to avoid infringing the Rule against Perpetuities (q).

If an executory trust must be executed, if at all, within the required limits, and the trust, when executed, is such as would have been good if executed by the testator, it is valid. The possibility that it may not be capable of such execution does not render it wholly void (r). Where an executory trust relating to leaseholds is created by reference to a trust relating to freeholds, and would, if applied verbatim to the leaseholds, be bad for remoteness, it ought to be so modified as to render it free from that objection (s). As to the cases where executory trusts will be executed cy-près, see above, p. 289.

With regard to powers, the general rule is that if a power can be exercised at a time beyond the limits of the Rule (which happens where the donee of the power and the occasion on which it can be exercised, may both be in existence beyond the limits of the Rule) the power is bad (t). Thus, a power which is to take effect on a general failure of the issue of a marriage, or a power to appoint by will given to a person who may not be ascertained within the limits of the rule, is bad (u). On the other hand, a power which must be exercised, if at all, during the period allowed by the Rule, is not rendered bad by the fact that within its terms an appointment could be made which would be too remote; as, where a power is given to A. to appoint to the issue of himself or another person (v). The mere existence of such a power does not affect the validity of the subsequent limitations. Thus, if a testator gives property upon trust for his daughter for life, with power to appoint a life interest to any husband she may marry, and then upon trust for a class not ascertainable until the determination of the previous trusts, the power is capable of being exercised in favour of a husband born after the testator's death, and, if it is so exercised, both the appointment and the subsequent limitations are bad for remoteness. But if it is not so exercised, the subsequent limitations are good (w).

Other examples.

And a trust or power which is unlimited in point of form may be good if an intention appears that it is to be exercised within the period allowed by the Rule (x). So if the existence of a collateral power depends on an estate which can be defeated by a tenant in tail, the power is good (y).

Where donee
person.

A power of appointment given to a living person cannot be void for remoteness, because it must be exercised, if at all, during his lifetime. But it may be inoperative if it is a special power, and if the objects are not ascertainable within due limits of time (z). Thus, a power given to A. to appoint to his first grandchild who shall be born five years after his death, and shall attain twenty-one, cannot be exercised at all, and is, therefore, ineffectual. And it seems that the efficacy of a power may depend on events which happen after its creation.

Hartnoll.

In Blight v. Hartnoll (a), a testatrix directed the surplus income of certain landed property to be accumulated for the purpose of paying off the mortgages thereon, and when that had been done, she directed her executors to sell the property and divide the proceeds among such of her grandchildren as might "then be surviving," and in such proportions as C. H. might appoint. C. H. made a will by which she purported to exercise the power in favour of certain grandchildren of the testatrix. When C. H. died, the property was still unsold. Fry, J., held that the appointment was bad, on two independent grounds : first, on the ground that it was made before the property was sold, and, secondly, on the ground that the " gift " was void for remoteness because the class of grandchildren living at the time of the sale could not be ascertained within the limits allowed by the Rule against Perpetuities. But, as Mr. Gray points out (b), if the first ground was good, it followed that the power could not be exercised unless the sale took place in the lifetime of C. H., and was therefore not objectionable on the ground of remoteness. Mr. Marsden (c) suggests that the trust for sale was itself void for remoteness, although no reference to the point is made in the judgment of Fry, J. It is submitted that the first ground given by Fry, J., is unsound and that the case was rightly decided on the second ground. If, however, the property had been sold during the lifetime of C. H., it seems clear that she might have made a valid appointment to any of the testatrix's grandchildren. If so, it follows that a power of appointment may be effectual or ineffectual according to the events which happen after its creation.

A power may be divisible, as regards the donee, so as to be equivalent to two powers, and if one of them is good, it is not affected by the badness of the other. Thus, a power for A. or the trustees for the time being of the testator's will to raise a certain sum of money for purposes not necessarily within the proper limits, may be good as to A. and bad as to the trustees (f).

Divisible
powers.

Limitations in default of appointment under a power which is void for remoteness are good, unless they are themselves obnoxious to the Rule against Perpetuities (g).

As to the validity of appointments under powers, see the next section (p. 316).

Mr. Jarman remarks (h) that " at one period it was much doubted whether a power of sale introduced into a deed or will containing limitations in strict settlement, and which was not in terms restricted in its exercise to the period allowed by law, was valid. The affirmative has now been decided in several instances (i) ; and in Boyce v. Hanning (j) the same rule was applied where the indefinite power occurred in a settlement containing limitations to A. for life, with remainder, subject to a jointure rent charge, to the children of A. in fee, with a cross executory limitation, in case of any of the children dying under age and without issue. These cases seem to have dispelled the alarm which was created by Lord Eldon's remarks in Ware v. Polhill (k); and it is observable that, in several of the cases referred to, the validity of the power was considered to be so clear, that a title derived under it was forced upon the acceptance of a purchaser. In practice, it often occurs that a sale is made under a will which empowers the testator's trustees, and the survivor and the heirs of the survivor, to sell his real estate (most commonly his copyholds, in order to avoid the necessity of the trustees being admitted previously to a sale), without any restriction in point of time. . . . The manner in which the objection to the validity of indefinite powers of sale in settlements was disposed of in the recent cases, leaves no room for doubt on this point. Indeed, it is observable that, in the early case of Holder v. Preston (l), the Court of King's Bench granted a mandamus to compel the lord of a manor to admit the purchaser of copyholds, claiming under the bargain and sale of trustees of a will, whose power was wholly unrestricted, and the validity of which does not appear to have been called in question."

power of sale.

The reason for holding such a power to be valid is not, as is sometimes said, that it facilitates alienation; the true reason is that when, by the death of a tenant for life, or (in the case of a strict settlement of land) by the coming of age of a tenant in fee or in tail, the power is no longer needed, it naturally ceases (m). But even where, on the death of a tenant for life, the property becomes absolutely vested in persons sui juris, the power of sale is not put an end to if it appears to be the intention of the testator that it should still be exerciseable in order to effect a division of the property: such a power is good, because it must be exercised within a reasonable time after the death of the tenant for life, and it can at any time be put an end to by the beneficiaries (n). So an unlimited power of sale may be good, if it is intended to be exercised (if at all) within a reasonable time after the testator's death: e.g., to pay debts and legacies (o). CHAPTER X.

With regard to the validity of trusts and powers of management and accumulation inserted in strict settlements of land, the following statement, with the accompanying notes, is taken from the third edition of this work, by Messrs. Wolstenholme and Vincent: "In all cases where under a deed or will a strict settlement is created, and (as is usually done) power is given to the trustees during the minority of any person entitled under the settlement to manage and let the property and receive the rents and profits (p), or to cut timber and sell it (g), and invest the moneys arising thereby in the purchase of other lands to be settled to the same uses, the exercise of these powers must be carefully restricted to the period of the minorities of tenants in tail by purchase, else the powers will be altogether void (r)."

(g) "Ferrand v. Wilson, 4 Hare, 373."

(r) "Mr. Lewis, in the supplement to his work on Perpetuities, doubts the correctness of the decision in Browne v. Stoughton, conceiving that such trusts are, like executory limitations engrafted on an estate tail, barrable along with the estate tail, and therefore not void for remoteness. But the trustees clearly have an actual estate in the lands, which estate is not subsequent or collateral, but anterior to the estate tail, and the trusts declared cannot therefore be affected by any act of the tenant in tail. This is clear from Marshall v. Holloway, where there was no term anterior to the estate tail, nor was the destination of the accumulated fund (if made) too remote, being identical with that of the general personalty, the gift of which was held good. The sole ground of the determination therefore was, that the trust for accumulation could not be split or severed, so as to place part before the first estate tail (which would be neither too remote nor barrable), and part after (which would be too remote if it were not barrable). The whole was an entire limitation, and must stand or fall together (see Pickford v. Brown, 2 K. & J. 426). If in Browne v. Stoughton the trust had been barrable along with the estate tail, some startling results would follow. Suppose, for instance, that instead of an accumulation being directed during minority, it had been directed during the first twenty-one years after the testator's death to raise money for payment of legacies, it must follow that the tenant in tail, if of full age, could bar the trust, and deprive the legatees of their legacies. The case of Browne v. Stoughton cannot therefore be distinguished from that of Lord Southampton v. Marquis of Hertford, 2 V. & B. 54, on the ground that, in the latter, a term was created anterior to the estate tail; indeed, Lord Eldon, in Marshall v. Holloway, 2 Sw. 445, expressly said that that made no difference. See also 3 Jur. N. S., pt. ii. 181. Mr. Sanders, the well-known writer on Uses, went even further than Mr. Lewis: in an opinion of his (Sanders on Uses, 5th edition, p. 203, n.) he says, with respect to Lord Southampton v. Marquis of Hertford, 'It is not easy to discover the ground of the decision, but it is to be observed that the term of 1000 years preceded the limitations in tail; and it seems to be inferred that a recovery by tenant in tail, subject to the term, did not destroy the preceding trusts of the term. If this be the case, there is a great fallacy in the inference; for the trusts of a term created for the purposes

CHAPTER X.

Trusts for management, &c., of settled
land.

The question of the validity of trusts and powers of the nature above referred to has given rise to considerable discussion. It is explained, in another section of this chapter, that where a term vested in trustees is precedent to the estate tail, and is, therefore, not barrable, the trusts annexed to the term will be void for remoteness if they exceed the limits allowed by the Rule against Perpetuities (s), and the same principle, of course, applies if the trusts are annexed to a fee simple estate vested in the trustees. It may, however, happen that the trusts are of such a nature that they must necessarily cease to exist if the entail is barred, and it has been suggested that in such a case a different principle ought to be applied. In Lade v. Holford (t), land was devised to trustees to the use of B. and his sons in tail in strict settlement, with a proviso directing the trustees, whenever any tenant for life or in tail should be under the age of twenty-six years, to enter and take the rents and profits, and after paying certain sums to apply the residue in the purchase of lands to be settled in the same way: it was held that these trusts were void. In Browne v. Stoughton (u), land was devised to trustees in trust for A. for life, and on his death in trust for his sons in tail male, with a declaration that so long as any person beneficially entitled in possession should be under twenty-one, the trustees should accumulate the rents and invest the same in the purchase of land to be settled on the same trusts: it was held by Shadwell, V.-C., that the trust was void for remoteness. In Ferrand v. Wilson (v), land was devised to the use of the testator's executors upon the trusts after declared and subject thereto to the use of certain persons and their sons in tail male, and power was given to the executors until some person entitled to an estate tail or some greater estate attained twenty-one years (w), to cut timber and of a settlement, must follow the ultimate devolution of the inheritance, and not the inheritance the trusts of the term. A recovery by tenant in tail would acquire the fee simple, and render the term attendant on the inheritance discharged of the trusts for accumulation.' The reader will, however, have seen from the decision in Case v. Drosier, that Mr. Sanders' opinion cannot now be taken as a correct view of the law on this point.' (This note, as mentioned above, is taken from the third edition of this work by Messrs. Wolstenholme and Vincent.)

apply the proceeds in the payment of debts and legacies, and the surplus in the purchase of lands to be settled. Wigram, V.-C., held the power to be too remote. In Floyer v. Bankes (x), a power to enter and manage settled estates during minorities was given to the trustees of an overriding term of 500 years, the surplus proceeds to be employed in improving the estates: Romilly, M. R., said the right of entry was clearly too remote.

Again, in Sykes v. Sykes (y), land was settled in tail subject to a term vested in trustees upon trust, in the event of any of the testator's younger sons or their issue becoming seised in possession of the estate by virtue of the will, to raise certain sums: it was held by Wickens, V.-C., on the authority of Case v. Drosier, that the trust was void for remoteness (z). On the other hand, in Longfield v. Bantry (a), a gift of personal property upon trust to purchase land and settle it on the testator's son in strict settlement, and in the meantime to apply the income in improving other estates settled by the will, "and for the benefit of the inheritance in the said estates, so long as the same shall be enjoyed by my said son or his descendants," was held good, principally, as it seems, on the ground that the trust was of a temporary character. The reason does not appear to be satisfactory, for in applying the

(z) These cases have been much discussed. See Lewis on Perp., Suppl. 174 seq.; 3 Jurist N. S. (pt. 2) 181; Messrs. Wolstenholme and Vincent's note in the earlier editions of this work, ante, p. 313; 3 Davids' Prec. 465, n.; Gray on Perp., § 456 seq. It is suggested by Mr. Lewis and Mr. Gray that Browne v. Stoughton was wrongly decided, because the tenant in tail had a vested interest in the accumulated fund, and that by barring the entail he could put a stop to the accumulation; and Mr. Gray thinks that Ferrand v. Wilson and Sykes v. Sykes were wrongly decided, because barring the entail would in Ferrand v. Wilson have destroyed the power, and in Sykes v. Sykes have made it impossible to carry the trusts into effect. But I cannot help thinking that there is a certain amount of confusion in the application of the modern Rule against Perpetuities to limitations and trusts annexed to an estate tail. Limitations subsequent to estates tail existed at common law before the modern Rule against Perpetuities was heard of, and no objection could be taken to them on the score of their tending to a perpetuity in the old sense of the term (supra, p. 283), because they were always liable to be destroyed by the entail being barred; and the same principle applied to limitations subsequent to or in defeasance of an estate tail created by way of use or trust. In other words, such limitations were not within the mischief which the modern Rule against Perpetuities was invented to prevent. But trusts for management, accumulation, and purchase of lands to be settled, stand on a totally different footing: such trusts do not in any way resemble any estate recognised by the common law; on the contrary, they are an interference with the normal incidents of an estate tail, and their effect may be to alter the interests of persons taking under the settlement at some remote date. As Shadwell, V.-C., said in Browne v. Stoughton, if there were a succession of minorities, the trusts might continue for an indefinite time. They are, therefore, within the mischief of the modern Rule against Perpetuities, and are void unless restricted within its limits [C. S.].

Rule against Perpetuities, possibilities, not probabilities, must be regarded.

The correctness of the principle laid down in Lade v. Holford, Browne v. Stoughton, and Sykes v. Sykes is now generally recognised, and powers of management, accumulation, &c., in a strict settlement are therefore always restricted to tenants by purchase (b).

Rule against Perpetuities does not apply to accumulations for payment of debts.

The invalidity of such trusts admits, however, of one exception, namely, where the fund arising therefrom is to be applied in discharge of incumbrances affecting the estate (c), for then they only prescribe a particular mode of paying the incumbrances, which, in case of a mortgage, the incumbrancer himself might adopt by entering into receipt of the rents and profits, and may at any time be put an end to, either by the owner paying the incumbrance, or the incumbrancer enforcing his claim against the corpus of the property; thus, there is no restraint on alienation. As the payment of all the debts of a testator can now be enforced out of his real as well as his personal estate, there seems, on the principle above noticed, no reason at the present day to doubt the validity of a trust for the accumulation for any period, however long, of the income of all or any part of a testator's property, whether real or personal, for the purpose of paying his debts (d).

Appointee under a special power must be competent to have taken immediately from the donor.

(C) APPOINTMENTS UNDER POWERS.—Mr. Jarman remarks (e) that “in the case of appointments, testamentary or otherwise, under powers of selection or distribution in favour of defined classes of objects, the appointees must be persons competent to have taken directly under the deed or will creating the power (f). The test, therefore, by which the validity of every such gift must be tried is, to read it as inserted in the deed or will creating the power, in the place of the power. Attention is often called to this doctrine in practice, where a power having been reserved by an ante-nuptial settlement to one or both of the marrying parties, to appoint an Richards*, 5 H. & N. 453, and the observations of Kay, J., and Jessel, M. R., thereon in London & South-Western Rail. Co. v. Gomm, 20 Ch. D. at pp. 573, 577, citing Sugd. Pow., 8th edition, p. 16.

(f) Crompton v. Barrow, 4 Ves. 681; Robinson v. Hardcastle, 2 T. R. 241, 380, 781. Similarly where a post-nuptial settlement is made in pursuance of an agreement on marriage, the date of the agreement, not of the settlement, must be considered on the question of perpetuity, Cooke v. Cooke, 38 Ch. D. 202. In Brudenell v. Elwes, 1 East, 442, the appointment was void for excess, not for remoteness or perpetuity.

estate or fund among the issue generally of the marriage, the donee wishes to exercise it by making a settlement of the property on the children of the marriage for life, with remainder to their children or issue; this, it is obvious, cannot be done; for, as the grandchildren of the marrying persons could not have been made objects of gift immediately under the limitations of the settlement, since they do not (like children) necessarily come in esse during the lives of either of the parties then in being, they cannot take under the appointment founded on such settlement (h). In order to bring the appointment within the prescribed limit, it must be confined to such issue as shall be born in the lifetime of the marrying parties, or one of them, or of some other person living at the time of the execution of the settlement, and during the period (as the case of Cadell v. Palmer allows us to say (i)) of twenty-one years afterwards, unless the vesting is

D. 208. The decision in Hutchinson v. Tottenham, [1898] 1 Ir. R. 403, is criticised by Mr. Gray, 404, n. The cases of D'Abbadie v. Bizoin, Ir. R., 5 Eq. 205, and Whitby v. Mitchell, 44 Ch. D. 85, rest on a different principle: the appointments in these cases were void under the old Rule against Perpetuities, ante, p. 281.

The first edition of this work contained the following note by Mr. Jarman: "It frequently happens that a parent, having a power of appointment, is desirous, on the marriage of a child, one of the objects of the power, to make a settlement in favour of such child, and also of the intended husband or wife, and the issue of the marriage. The purpose may be accomplished, if the child is of age and the power authorises an appointment by deed, by making an absolute appointment in favour of the child; who then, by the same (or more usually by a separate) deed, settles the appointed property upon the several objects of the intended marriage; and in such case it is conceived that, even if it could be shewn that the appointment was made with the express previous understanding that it should be followed by such a settlement, the validity of the appointment would not be affected; though equity certainly is very jealous of all such transactions, and if there is any previous contract for benefiting the donee himself, even though only extending to a loan of the appointed sum, the appointment would clearly be bad. Of course it is desirable, even in making such a settlement as is above suggested, to avoid shewing that it was the result of a previous arrangement between the appointor and appointee. If the marrying child is a minor, the appointment might be made in favour of any other child, being adult, who would then make the intended settlement. Where the power in question is exerciseable by will only, the donee's desire to embrace the issue of the appointee, or any other persons who are not objects of the power, of course cannot be attained by any such means; and the nearest approach which can be made to the scheme is, in the first instance, to appoint the property to the child absolutely, and then, to enjoin him to execute the desired settlement of the appointed property; and, as an inducement to his doing so, to make it the condition of some other benefit which he is to derive under the will." Some caution should be observed before adopting the suggestion of Mr. Jarman that on the marriage of a minor an appointment under a power to appoint to children might be made to an adult child who would then settle the fund. See Pryor v. Pryor, 2 De G., J. & S. 205; Birley v. Birley, 25 Beav. 299; and see Re Turner's Settled Estates, 28 Ch. D. 205, at pp. 216, 217. [Note by Mr. Robbins in the fifth edition of this work.]

(i) It will be remembered that the exact terms of the modern Rule against Perpetuities were not settled until the decision in Cadell v. Palmer, in 1833. The first edition of Mr. Jarman's book was published in 1844.

CHAPTER X.

Effect of power and appointment, or one of them, embracing too wide a range of objects.

postponed (as it commonly is) to majority, which would absorb the twenty-one years; and even in regard to the children of the marriage, the vesting of the shares must not be protracted beyond the decease of the surviving parent, and the attainment of majority" (j), or beyond the period of twenty-one years from the decease of the surviving parent.

But Mr. Jarman's test requires some qualification, for "it is not meant that the precise language of the instrument exercising the power is to be read into the instrument creating it" (k). If the appointment is made by will, it does not, owing to the ambulatory nature of the instrument, take effect until the testator's death, and it follows that the persons intended to take under the appointment are not ascertained until that time. Thus under a power to appoint to the testator's issue, an appointment to A., a daughter of the testator, for life, and after her death to her next of kin, is good if A. is born in the testator's lifetime, and if her next of kin are issue of the testator (kk). In a case in which a question of this nature arose, the testator gave property upon such trusts for the benefit of C. T. and his present and future issue as A. B. should appoint; A. B. by her will appointed it in trust for C. T. for life, and after his death for all his children who had attained or should attain twenty-five if born in her lifetime, or twenty-one if born after her decease. All of C. T.'s children attained twenty-five before A. B.'s death. It was held that upon the appointment taking effect, namely, at A. B.'s death, the shares of the appointees were vested and ascertained, and that the appointment was therefore good (l).

Where a power does in terms authorise an appointment to issue only who are born within due limits, an appointment to a more extensive range of issue would be totally void if made to the whole as a class to take as tenants in common, for the shares of the issue who are within the line could not be ascertained (n). But in the converse case, viz. that of the power embracing issue generally

(m) [1906] 2 Ch. 288. According to a note in the Law Quarterly Review (xxiii. 9), the invalidity of the limitations in this case resulted from a number of complicated provisions not referred to in the report.

(n) In the first edition Mr. Jarman stated that such an appointment would be good pro tanto, on the ground that "as the issue who are beyond the line are also strangers to the power, the instrument would be simply nugatory quoad the shares of the remote appointees." But this opinion is clearly unsound, for the reason given in the text. See the third edition of this work, p. 272; Gray on Perp., § 538.

and the appointment being duly restricted to issue within the prescribed boundary, there can be no doubt that the appointment would be good (o). If the power and appointment both embrace too wide a range of objects, and the appointment is made to the children or issue as a class, it will, according to the general principle before adverted to, be void in toto, as well as to members of the class who are within, as to those who are not within, the line (p).

If, however, a separate sum is appointed to each member of the class independently of the others, the appointment is good as to those who come within the limits allowed by the Rule, and bad as to the others (q). And if the power and the appointment are so limited that the shares of all the appointees can be ascertained within the proper limits, no question of remoteness arises; the appointment is good as to the appointees who are objects of the power, and void as to the others (r). In Re Farncombe's Trusts (s), A. had a power to appoint to her issue, "such issue to be born before any such appointment"; A. by deed appointed to her daughter B. for life and after her death to her children, at twenty-one, with a clause of accruer; at the date of the appointment B. had three children living, and she had three born afterwards; one of the children attained twenty-one after the death of B.; the rest were minors: it was held by Hall, V.-C., that the appointment was good as to the three children of B. living at the date of the appointment, and that the share of each of them would be determined by the number of all the children who attained twenty-one; consequently, if all attained twenty-one, each of the three children who were objects of the power would take one-sixth.

Again, although under a special power to appoint to children, a life estate may (as we have seen) be limited to a child unborn at the time of the creation of the power, the limitation to such child of a power to appoint by will would be void, since it would tie up the property until the death of the unborn child (t). But such a power may be limited to a child born at the time of the creation of the power (u). And the limitation of a power to appoint by deed of will would be valid even in the case of a child unborn at the time of the creation of the original power, since a power to appoint by deed or will confers an absolute and immediate power of disposition (v), although it would be void if a condition precedent (not necessarily to be fulfilled within the limits) were attached to it (w). A determinable life interest, however, may be appointed to an unborn child (x). So, an appointment to a child (unborn at the creation of the power) for life, with remainder to his executors or administrators as part of his personal estate, is good (y). The validity of limitations to unborn persons is discussed below, pp. 348 seq.; many of the cases there cited arose on appointments under special powers.

Unborn child.

CHAPTER X.

Appointment
unknown

In Blight v. Hartnoll (z), Fry, J., laid down the rule that where a person has power to appoint among a class, he must know the class at the time he exercises the power; if, for example, A. had power to appoint among his children who should be living at the return of B. from Rome, and the power were exercised by A. before B. returned from Rome, Fry, J., thought that that would be a bad exercise of the power. But there seems to be no foundation for this doctrine (a), and in Re Coulman (b), where A. had a power to appoint to issue, and she appointed to an object of the power for life, with remainder to his next of kin, Pearson, J., said: "To my mind there is no reason why they [the next of kin] should not take if at the time when the tenant for life dies his next of kin happen to be issue," that is, objects of the power. "The question," he said, "is a very curious one."

by reference.

An appointment may be made by reference. And accordingly, if under a special power a testator appoints to the uses or trusts of an existing deed, "or such of them as are capable of taking effect," the phrase "capable of taking effect" may be construed as meaning what the law allows to take effect, so that if some of the uses or trusts fail by reason of the Rule against Perpetuities being infringed, they may be treated as excluded from the appointment (c).

Absolute appointment followed by qualifications void for remoteness.

The doctrine that where a gift is absolute in the first instance, and is followed by qualifications or restrictions which are void for remoteness, the original gift prevails, applies to appointments under powers. In fact, many of the leading cases on the doctrine are cases of appointments (d).

CHAPTER X.

The test of the validity of appointments under special powers above alluded to is, of course, not applicable to appointments under general powers, because such powers are, in point of alienation, equivalent to absolute ownership: the donee can dispose of the property as he pleases. It follows that the period for the commencement of limitations under such appointments in point of remoteness is the time of the execution of the power, and not of the creation of it. And it has been held that the same principle applies where the power, though general in its objects, is to be exercised by will only, in which case the period allowed by the Rule will run from the testator's death (e).

Under general powers time is computed from the appointment.

(D) LIMITATIONS AFTER FAILURE OF ISSUE.—An executory limitation to arise on an indefinite failure of issue (f) of any person living or dead, is, of course, void for remoteness (g).

An executory limitation to arise on an indefinite failure of issue, void.

This rule, however, does not apply if the original gift itself fails to take effect on the death of the testator. Thus, if leaseholds are bequeathed to A. for life, with remainder to his sons in tail, with remainder to B. in tail, and A. dies without issue during the lifetime of the testator, the gift to B. is good, and gives him an absolute interest in the leaseholds. If A. were to survive the testator, the gift over to B. would be absolutely bad (h).

Exception where previous gift fails.

In the case of real estate, moreover, if an executory devise is so limited that it must necessarily take effect either during the Babington*, 27 L. R. Ir. 551; Mr. Gray, however, thinks that the principle laid down in Re Powell's Trusts is correct (Gray on Perp., § 526 seq.).

(f) It will be remembered that under s. 29 of the Wills Act, words importing an indefinite failure of issue of A. primâ facie mean a failure of issue during the lifetime or at the time of the death of A. See Chap. LIII. Even under the old law a gift in default of issue might bear a restricted meaning, so as to avoid any question of remoteness; Murray v. Addenbrook, 4 Russ. 407.

CHAPTER X.

continuance, or immediately after the determination, of an estate tail, it will be good, because the power which resides in the owner of that estate to destroy all posterior limitations, executory as well as vested, takes the case out of the mischief which the Rule against Perpetuities was designed to prevent (i). Thus, if a person, by deed or will, creates an estate tail, and annexes to it a proviso divesting the estate in favour of another in case the devisee, or his issue in tail, should at any time thereafter neglect to assume the name and bear the arms of the testator, or in case another property should at any future time devolve to him or them, or on any other such event: this executory limitation, though it would have been clearly void if engrafted on an estate in fee simple, is good as applied to an estate tail (j). So a trust for sale and division of the proceeds, to take effect on the failure of an estate tail, is good (k).

Equitable estates tail.

The rule above stated applies not only to legal but also to equitable estates tail, because the latter can be barred in the same way as if they were legal.

Distinction
as to legal contingent

If, however, the event on which a limitation after an estate tail is to take effect may not happen until after the estate tail has determined, there is a difference between a legal contingent remainder on the one hand, and an equitable contingent remainder or an executory devise on the other. For if the limitation is equitable or executory, so that there may be an interval during which it is indestructible, it is void ab initio (l). If, on the other hand, the limitation after the estate tail is a legal contingent remainder, the remoteness of the event upon which it is to vest is immaterial, since it is always barrable as long as the estate tail continues; and if, being unbarred, it is not vested when the latter determines, it fails for want of a particular estate. Thus, in Jack v. Fetherstone (m), estates were limited by settlement to T. S. W. for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, and for default of such issue male, and in case of issue female only of T. S. W., to T. S. W. in fee, and in case of failure of issue of T. S. W., then further limitations were made. It was argued that the ultimate limitations being deferred till a general failure of issue of T. S. W., while previous estates were limited to his issue male only, were too remote; but Bushe, C. J., said that this objection was in some degree founded on a misapprehension of Mr. Fearne's meaning, and in not distinguishing the limitation from the event: the event might be such that it might happen either before or after the future estate was to vest, and yet the possibility it might happen after did not affect the nature of the limitation. So that the remoteness of the event is immaterial, if the estate is not too remote.

In Cole v. Sewell (n), the same question arose as to the validity of estates limited by deed, to take effect in case of a general failure of issue, by way of remainder after previous estates tail limited to some only of such issue. Lord St. Leonards (then L. C. Ir.) held the remainder to be good. Cole v. Sewell.

This decision was affirmed in the House of Lords (o). Lord Cottenham observed: "It is said that this last limitation is too remote, because, there being no previous limitation to issue generally, there might be a failure of all the prior limitations, and yet issue, as in the case of a son of a daughter, might exist, so that this last limitation would not take effect. But if this be a remainder, it would be barrable, and the objection, therefore, would not arise." He then went on to shew that the limitation in question was a remainder limited on a contingency, and therefore good.

So in Doe d. Winter v. Perratt (p), where the devise was to I. C. in tail male, with remainder to the first male heir of the branch of R. C.'s family who lived at H., the branch of R. C.'s family who lived at H. might have consisted for an indefinite time of females only; so that the gift to the first male heir who should come into existence was too remote, had it not been limited by way of contingent remainder; but being so limited, no doubt of its validity was expressed on this ground; the only question was, who was meant by "first male heir." Doe v. Perratt.

A term of years (like any other estate) may be made expectant by way of remainder on an estate tail; but sometimes it happens that the term is so limited as to render it hard to say whether it is ulterior or precedent to the estate tail. If the term is precedent to the estate tail, of course it cannot be defeated by the acts of the tenant in tail (q): and in such case, if the trusts of the term are not to arise until the failure of issue under the entail, those trusts are necessarily void. As in Case v. Drosier (r), where a testator devised his estates at M. and T. to trustees for 500 years, upon the trusts after declared, and he then devised the M. estate, subject to the term, to A. for life, with remainder to his sons and daughters in tail, in strict settlement, in the usual manner, with remainder to B. and his sons and daughters in like manner. He then devised the T. estate in a similar manner, except that B. was put in the place of A. And the testator declared the trusts of the term of 500 years to be for the purpose (among others) of raising portions for two granddaughters, payable at twenty-one, and further portions, in case either A. or B. should die without issue, and all which were to sink in case they died under age and unmarried. Lord Langdale, M. R., thought that the words "without issue" meant without issue who were objects of the prior limitations; but as this might be a remote event, and as there were no means by which the charges could be barred, the trusts could not be supported. "They depend," he observed, "on a term, and that term is precedent to the estates tail, so that after a recovery there would remain a term and a trust to be performed: a trust which could not be defeated, and a term which cannot be destroyed."

Of course, it is not the mere limitation of an estate tail—as, to the first son of A., who never has a son,—but the vesting of it in the devisee, which protects the trusts of the subsequent term. On the death of A. without having had a son, the trusts will be good or bad or (if severable) some good and some bad, according as they are within or without the limits set by the Rule against Perpetuities (s).

whether precedent or

The question whether an executory limitation was precedent or subsequent to an estate tail, was much discussed in Doe d. Lumley v. Earl of Scarborough (t), where lands were devised to A. for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, remainders over, with a proviso that if the earldom of S. should descend upon A. or any of his sons, within the period of certain lives, or within the term of twenty-one years after the decease of the survivor, his or their estate should cease, and the lands remain over as if he or they were dead without issue. The eldest son of A. suffered a common recovery, and A. joined in the conveyance for the purpose of making a tenant to the præcipe. The earldom afterwards devolved upon A. It was held in the Exchequer Chamber (u) (reversing a decision in B. R.), that the executory limitation was barred; the Court being of opinion that this was a mere proviso for the cesser of the old estates created by the will to which it applied, so as to accelerate and let in the enjoyment of the remainders over, and not (as had been considered in the Court below) the creation of any new estate. The Judges in B. R. were of opinion that the proviso operated, not by way of determining or defeating the estate tail of the son of A., but antecedently to that estate, by preventing the estate tail from ever taking effect; and that the persons entitled in remainder had two distinct estates, one of which was antecedent, and the other posterior to the estate tail, and consequently, that the former could not be affected by the recovery.

The question of the validity of trusts and powers to take effect during a strict settlement of land has been already discussed (v).

The devise of an estate in reversion may, it seems, be void for remoteness when a devise of an estate in remainder would not (w). A reversion is, in fact, a present interest, since it carries the services and rent (if any) during the subsistence of the particular estate (x); and a devise of it, therefore, contingently on a future event is, like a similar devise of any other estate in possession, an executory limitation which need not vest eo instanti that the particular estate determines, and is void if the event be too remote. Thus, in Bankes v. Holme (y), where a settlor, having the reversion in fee expectant on a failure of issue male of his sons and issue general of his daughters, devised it on the contingency of there being no child or children of his wife by him begotten, or (as eventually happened) there being such, all of them should die without issue; it was held that the devise was too remote and void (z). If the devise in this case had been such as to create a remainder in fee, such remainder could only have taken effect in case the general failure of issue had happened simultaneously with the determination of the estates tail to the sons and daughters (a), and up to that time would have been barrable, and therefore not too remote. The devise of the reversion, on the other hand, though barrable during the subsistence of the estates tail, would not necessarily have always been barrable, since, taking effect as it did by way of executory devise, it must, if held valid, have awaited the time when the issue general failed; an indefinitely long period might thus elapse between the determination of the estates tail and the failure of issue general, during which the reversion would have descended in fee to the testator's heir, who could not have barred the executory gift, and the rules against perpetuity would have been infringed (b).

A devise of a reversion may be void when a similar devise of a remainder would be good.

CHAPTER X.

remainders.

Equitable contingent remainders in land are not governed by the same rule as contingent remainders of legal estates; for they do not necessarily vest or fail upon the determination of the previous estate, but await the happening of the contingency on which they are limited (c), and are, therefore, invalid if that contingency be too remote (d). But, like executory devises, they are good after an estate tail, if limited on an event which must necessarily happen at or before the determination of that estate, as in the case of a trust for a class to be ascertained at or before such determination (e).

Personal
property.

A gift of personal property to a person in tail gives him, as is well known, an absolute interest. The result of this rule may be to make a gift valid which would otherwise be too remote. In a recent case (f), a testator gave personalty to A. for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to the first and other sons of B., a spinster, in tail male, with remainder to the first and other sons of C., a spinster, in tail male, with remainder to the first son of D., a married woman, in tail male, and in default

D. 211, where the devise was to trustees during the life of A., and at his death to convey to such son of B. of such issue to the second and other sons of D. in tail male; A., B., C., and D. survived the testator; A. and C. died unmarried; B. was past the age of child-bearing; D. had had two sons, the elder of whom died before the testator: it was held that the gift to the second son on failure of issue of the first son was not void for remoteness.

(E) GIFTS TO CLASSES.—A gift to a class of persons is void if the time at which the class is to be ascertained is not within the period allowed by the Rule (g). Thus, in Lett v. Randall (h), the testator gave his residuary estate to his children in equal shares, with a proviso that if any of his daughters should marry, and die in her husband's lifetime, her share should go to her husband for life, and after his decease to the children of his daughter "then living": it was held that, as the husband of any daughter might be a person not in existence at the testator's death, the class to take on the husband's death would not necessarily be ascertained within due limits, and that the gift to the children of the daughters was void for remoteness. So, in Re Gage (i), a gift to a class including such of a number of unborn persons as should marry, was held void for remoteness.

A gift to such of a number of persons living at the death of the testator as shall be living at the end of thirty years is good (j).

It has been already mentioned that a child en ventre sa mère is, for the purposes of the Rule, considered to be a living person (k).

Posthumous child.

"The most frequent instances of the transgression of the Rule against Perpetuities," as Mr. Jarman remarks (l), "occur in devises or bequests to classes comprising either individuals who may not come into existence at all during a life in being and twenty-one years afterwards, or persons who may not be in esse at the death of the testator, and the vesting of whose shares is postponed beyond majority. In the former case the Rule is fatally violated, even though the gift to the unborn objects is so framed as to confer on them vested interests immediately on their birth."

If that case was rightly decided, it seems to follow that a gift to such of the children of A. as shall be living at the time of the testator's decease or born in due time thereafter and shall attain the age of twenty-five years, would be void for remoteness. The point, however, did not arise in Re Wass, and when the case occurs the Court may possibly give effect to the obvious intention of the testator.

(l) First edition, p. 226.

CHAPTER X.

An example of the latter kind is supplied by the case of Dodd v. Wake (m), where a testator bequeathed a sum of 8000*l.* unto and amongst the children of his daughter M. M. "who shall be living at the time the eldest shall live to attain the age of twenty-four years, and the issue of such of the children of my said daughter as may then happen to be dead leaving issue," per stirpes and not per capita, as tenants in common, and to be paid as and when they should attain twenty-four, but without interest in the meantime. M. M. had three children living at the testator's death; but the question was, whether the bequest was not void for remoteness, inasmuch as all these children might die under twenty-four, and then the legacy could not vest in any child, until the expiration of twenty-four years and upwards after the testator's decease. Sir L. Shadwell said: "The testator appears clearly to have intended that only those children of his daughter should take who should be alive when the eldest child for the time being should attain the age of twenty-four, and therefore the bequest is void for remoteness."

Distinction
remainders.

"It is proper to remark," says Mr. Jarman (n), "that, in the class of cases under consideration, a limitation which would as an executory devise be void for remoteness, may be good as a contingent remainder, on account of the necessity, which the rules applicable to contingent remainders impose, of its vesting, if at all, at the instant of the determination of the preceding estate for life. Such an estate, therefore, if limited to a person who was in existence at the death of the testator, necessarily restricts the devise within proper bounds. Thus, if lands of which the testator had the legal inheritance be devised to A. for life, with remainder in fee to the children of A. who shall attain the age of twenty-two, the devise in remainder will be good, because if at the death of A. no child has attained the vesting age, the remainder will fail under the doctrine in question (o); and if any child has attained that age, the devise will take effect in favour of such child, to the exclusion of any child or children afterwards attaining the prescribed age" (p).

in Brackenbury v. Gibbons, 2 Ch. D. 419; the reference to the page, however, would indicate the third edition (by Messrs. Wolstenholme and Vincent), in which the passage in question, although attributed to Mr. Jarman, is materially altered. The operation of the rule thus stated by Mr. Jarman is considered in connection with the Contingent Remainders Act, 1877, post, Chap. XXXVIII.

The doctrine does not, of course, apply to equitable contingent remainders (pp). CHAPTER X.

Difficult questions frequently arise as to whether a limitation of this kind is a contingent remainder or an executory devise; the question is of importance in connection with gifts to classes, because it regulates the manner in which the class is ascertained (q). Ascertainment of class.

It has been already mentioned that a gift which is apparently contingent and void for remoteness, is valid because it confers an interest which is vested subject to being divested (r). The distinction is sometimes fine. Thus, in Re Mervin (s), the testator gave his property upon trust for the children of his son J. as and when they should respectively attain the age of twenty-five years, and gave his trustees power in the meantime to apply the whole or any part of the income for the maintenance of such grandchildren during their minority, and to apply for the advancement of them or any of them one-half of the capital to which they or he might be entitled expectant on their, his, or her attaining the age of twenty-five years. It was held that the grandchildren did not take vested interests, and that the gift was void for remoteness. On the other hand, in Re Turney (t), a testator gave a fund upon trust for his daughter for life, and after her death in trust for all her children when they should attain twenty-five, but not before, and gave a moiety of the residue of his estate upon trust for his son for life, and after his death for his child or children absolutely upon their attaining twenty-five; the will contained references to the "shares" and "portions" of the grandchildren, and provisions for their maintenance, and the Court of Appeal held, on the construction of the whole will, that the grandchildren took immediate vested interests, subject to being divested in case they did not attain twenty-five, and that the trusts were not void for remoteness (u). Where interests

Again, if there is a gift to the children of A., followed by a direction to postpone payment of the respective shares until the children attain twenty-five, this direction is disregarded, and the children of A. living at the testator's death take vested interests (v). Postponement of payment of vested shares beyond age of twenty-one.

An apparent exception to the doctrine that vested interests are not open to the objection of remoteness, occurs in those cases where property is given to a class which is liable to fluctuation after the Class capable of enlargement or

period allowed by the Rule. Thus, suppose property to be given to A., a bachelor, for life, with remainder to his eldest son for life, remainder to those children of B. who attain twenty-five: at the testator's death B. is living, and one of his children, C., has attained twenty-five. Here C.'s interest is vested, and yet the gift to B.'s children is too remote, for although the maximum size of each child's share will be fixed at B.'s death, the minimum may not be determined until twenty-five years afterwards (w).

ascertained
death.

A gift to a class may be good, because although it is, in form, a gift to a class which may not be ascertained within due limits, it is, in fact (having regard to the state of things existing at the testator's death (x)), a gift to a class which must be ascertained within due limits. Thus, in Picken v. Matthews (y), a testator gave his real and personal property upon trust for such of the children of his daughters as should live to attain twenty-five. At his death one of his daughters had a child who had attained twenty-five: there were other children under that age. It was held that the class consisted of the daughter's children who were living at the death of the testator, subject to their attaining twenty-five. But if a proviso is added that in the event of any child dying under twenty-five, his or her children who attain twenty-five shall take their parents' share, the whole gift is bad for remoteness (z).

Von
Malcolm.

Again, in Von Brockdorff v. Malcolm (a), property was settled upon A. for life, and after his death upon such of his issue born in his lifetime as he should appoint: by will, he appointed it to all his daughters who should survive him, and should, during his lifetime, or after his death, attain twenty-four. A. left four daughters, of whom the youngest was over three years old at his death. The appointment was held to be good. Pearson, J., seemed to think the case was governed by Wilkinson v. Duncan (b), but that was a case of independent gifts (c), and the real reason why the appointment in Von Brockdorff v. Malcolm was good is that given by Mr.

(w) Gray on Perp., §§ 110a, 205a.

(y) 10 Ch. D. 264. If no child of either daughter had attained twenty-five at the testator's death, the gift would have failed: Re Mervin, [1891] 3 Ch. 197.

(z) Re Whitten, 62 L. T. 391. In Re Barker, 92 L. T. 831, there were gifts of two moiety of the property, each followed by a substitutional gift to the issue of any child who predeceased its parent, although no life interest was given to that parent, part of the clause having been apparently struck out without altering the other part: it was held that as to one moiety the gift was good, as one of the children had attained twenty-five before the testator's death; in the case of the other moiety no child had attained that age, and the gift therefore failed.

(b) 7 Jur. N. S. 1182, ante, p. 319.

Gray (d), namely, that the class of daughters surviving the testator was closed when the will took effect, and the appointment was to such of them as should attain twenty-four; the ultimate class, therefore, would necessarily be ascertained within twenty-one years after his death.

"It is to be observed," says Mr. Jarman (e), "that where a gift to a class extends to objects too remote, the fact that some of the objects eventually composing the class were actually born within the period allowed by the rule of law, will not render the gift valid, quoad those objects. Thus, in Leake v. Robinson (f), where certain stock and moneys were bequeathed to W. R. R. for life, and after his decease, to the child or children of the said W. R. R. who, being a son or sons, should attain the age of twenty-five, or being a daughter or daughters, attain that age, or be married with consent; and in case the said W. R. R. should happen to die without leaving issue living at the time of his decease, or leaving such, they should all die before any of them should attain twenty-five, if sons, and if daughters, before they should attain such age, or be married as aforesaid, then to the brothers and sisters of the said W. R. R., on their attaining twenty-five, if a brother or brothers, and if a sister or sisters, on such age or marriage as aforesaid. It appeared that five of the brothers and sisters of W. R. R. were born before the testator's death, and it was contended, therefore, that the bequest, though confessedly void as to those born afterwards, was good as to these objects; for that no case had gone the length of deciding that persons who are capable of taking under a will should not take, merely because they are joined in a bequest with others who are incapable; but Sir W. Grant, M. R., held that the bequest was void as to the whole, observing, with his usual felicity: 'The bequests in question are not made to individuals, but to classes; and what I have to determine is, whether the class can take. I must make a new will for the testator, if I split into portions his general bequest to the class, and say that, because the rule of law forbids his intention from operating in favour of the whole class, I will make his bequests what he never intended them to be, viz. a series of particular legacies to particular individuals; or, what he has as little in his contemplation, distinct bequests, in each instance, to different classes, namely, to grandchildren living at his death, and to grandchildren born after his death' (g).

"And even if all the members of the class had happened to be born during the life of the tenant for life, or even in the lifetime of the testator himself, the gift would nevertheless have been absolutely void, as it is an invariable principle in applying the Rule under consideration, that regard is had to possible, not actual events, and the fact that the gift might have included objects too remote is fatal to its validity, irrespectively of the event."

In a simple case like Leake v. Robinson, it is easy to see how the gift to persons within the proper limits is so mixed up with the gift to those who are not, that the whole must fail, for it is clear that unless we wait beyond the allowed period, the precise shares of those within the proper limits could never be ascertained. Other cases have, however, occurred in which there has been much controversy as to what constitutes such a blending of the two gifts as will prevent the gift to the persons who are within the proper limits from taking effect.

children and grand-

The question has been much discussed in cases where there is a gift to a class composed of the children and grandchildren of a person. Thus, suppose property to be given to A. for life, and after his death to all his children who attain twenty-one, and such of the children as attain twenty-one of any children of A. who die under that age leaving issue, the grandchildren taking their parent's shares; here the number of shares is fixed at the death of A., but there is a possibility that A. may leave a child under age, and if that child died under twenty-one, leaving children, some of them might not attain twenty-one within the limits fixed by the Rule against Perpetuities (h), so that the shares to be ultimately taken could not be ascertained within due time, and the whole gift is consequently void (i). It was at one time considered that in such a case the gifts

(g) The doctrine of Leake v. Robinson was discussed in Hale v. Hale (3 Ch. D. 643) and Pearks v. Moseley (5 App. Ca. 714). The books abound with cases in which the decision in Leake v. Robinson has been followed; it will be sufficient to refer to some of them: Judd v. Judd, 3 Sim. 525; Newman v. Newman, 10 ib. 51; Comport v. Austen, 12 ib. 218; Ring v. Hardwick, 2 Beav. 352; Bull v. Pritchard, 1 Russ. 213, 5 Hare, 567; Vawdry v. Geddes, 1 R. & My. 203; Blagrove v. Hancock, 16 Sim. 371; Walker v. Mower, 16 Beav. 365; Southern v. Wollaston, 16 Beav. 166;

Merlin v. Blagrove, 25 Beav. 125; Pickford v. Browne, 2 K. & J. 426; Read v. Gooding, 21 Beav. 478; Rowland v. Tawney, 26 Beav. 67; Smith v. Smith, L. R., 5 Ch. 342, referred to below.

(h) If the gift were "to all the children of A. who attain twenty-one and the issue of such of them as shall die under that age, leaving issue at their decease," it would, of course, be good: per Lord Selborne in Pearks v. Moseley, 5 App. Ca. 719.

(i) Another example of the same principle will be found in Blight v. Hartnoll, 19 Ch. D. 294, ante, p. 310.

might be severed, so that the gift to the children might be held good as an original gift, the gift to the grandchildren being treated as substitutional, apparently on the ground that effect ought to be given to the testator's intention as far as possible (j). But in applying the Rule against Perpetuities, the effect of the Rule is not allowed to influence the construction of the will, and it is now established that if the gift is to a class it cannot be severed (k).

If, however, the gift to the children is really original, and the gift to the grandchildren substitutional, the gift to the children is good (l). Thus, if a fund is bequeathed to the daughters of A. (a person living at the testator's death), with a proviso that if any of them die under the age of twenty-one, leaving issue, the share of the daughter so dying shall go to such of her children as attain twenty-one; here the gift to the daughters of A. is good, and if one of them is born after the testator's death and dies under twenty-one, leaving issue, the substitutional gift is clearly bad, and the original gift to the daughter is undisturbed. It seems also to follow that if a daughter of A., born in the testator's lifetime, dies under twenty-one, leaving children who attain twenty-one, the substitutional gift to those children will take effect. In Goodier v. Johnson (m), the testator directed his trustees, at a period which might possibly exceed the proper limits, to sell his real estate and divide the proceeds equally among the children of W. and M., "and the lawful issue of such of them as may be then dead, leaving issue," per stirpes. The trust for sale was bad (n), but the substantive gift of the property to the children of W. and M. was good, because, having regard to some peculiar clauses in the will, the Court held that the gift to the children was an original gift to them, with a substitutionary gift to their issue in certain events. "That will leave untouched the gift to the children who die without leaving issue, and if by rule of law the substitutionary gift in favour of the issue of any of the children cannot take effect, then the original gift to the children will take effect. The corpus is then effectually given, because it is given to a class to be ascertained within the limits of perpetuity, and to take a vested interest within those limits, subject to gifts over, which, if they are beyond the limits, fail, and leave the original gift unaffected" (o).

The question whether a gift is original or substitutional is discussed elsewhere (p).

Independent gifts.

Another difficult class of cases is where the question arises whether the testator has made an independent gift to each member of the class. Where he gives a fixed sum to each member of the class the gifts are separable, and will take effect or fail according to the event. Thus, in Storrs v. Benbow (q), where the testator bequeathed 500*l.* to each child that might be born to either of the children of either of his brothers, it was decided by Lord Cranworth that the gift was valid as to the children of nephews who were born in the testator's lifetime, and void as to the children of the other nephews. He said it was a mistake to compare the case with Leake v. Robinson. The legacy given to one of the former set of children could not be bad because there was a legacy given under a similar description to a person who would not be able to take because the gift was too remote.

Griffith v. Pownall.

And even where a fund is given among a number of unascertained persons, so that the share of each depends on the number of the class, yet if this number must be ascertained within the limits of the Rule against Perpetuities the gifts are separable. Thus, in Griffith v. Pownall (r), A. had a power to appoint among all the children of B., begotten and to be begotten, and their issue; and in default to the children equally. All the children that B. ever had (six in number) were born at the time of the creation of the power, and A. appointed that the share which each child of B., begotten and to be begotten, was entitled to in default of appointment, should be held in trust for that child for life, and after its death for its children. Sir L. Shadwell, V.-C., held the appointment valid. He said that, if the gift be of the bulk of the property amongst a set of persons collectively, some of whom are within the rule of law as to perpetuity, but the rest of them are not, the gift is void in toto. That in the case before him the gift was not of the bulk of the fund, but the testator merely directed how the share of each daughter should go after her death. If there had been a seventh or eighth daughter, the gift would have been bad as to their children ; nevertheless, the gift to the elder children would have been good.

The distinction was disregarded in Greenwood v. Roberts (s), Greenwood v. Roberts, contra. where the testator bequeathed personal property upon trust, among other things, to pay his brother Thomas an annuity of 200*l.* a year, and after his decease to pay the same to and amongst such of his children as might be then living in equal shares during their respective lives, and at the decease of any of them, he ordered that so much of the principal or capital stock as had been adequate to the payment of the annuity to which the child so dying had been entitled during his or her life, should be sold, and the produce thereof divided equally amongst the children of him or her so dying, when they should severally attain the age of twenty-one years ; he gave them vested interests therein ; and further directed that if any of the children of his brother Thomas should at his (Thomas's) death be dead and have left issue, such issue should be entitled among them to the same sum as they would eventually have been entitled to had their parents survived Thomas. Thomas survived the testator, and left a son Richard, who was alive at the death of the testator ; but it was held by Sir J. Romilly, M. R., that the children of Richard could not take. He said, " The gift is, in the first instance, distinctly to a class, namely, to such of the children of his brother Thomas as may be then living, and Richard takes a life interest in that bequest solely in his character of one of those children. The gift over after the decease of those children is not confined to such of the children of his brother as should be alive at the testator's decease, and nothing points to Richard more than any other child of Thomas, who might be born after the death of the testator. I am of opinion that I must, upon the expression used by the testator, treat ' the children of him or her so dying ' as another class, and that I cannot, because the testator has directed that on the death of Thomas the fund is to be equally divided between such of his children as shall be then alive, treat the bequest as if it had been a separate set of bequests to each of such children as eventually constituted the class ; and therefore, in my opinion, he has given this annuity to a class to be ascertained at a future period, and after the death of each of the persons constituting that class to another class, some of whom are prohibited by law from taking, by reason of the Rule against Perpetuities. If I am correct in this view, the rule in Leake v. Robinson must apply. I am of opinion that Richard is neither mentioned nor individually described in the will as a person taking (to use Lord Cottenham's expression, in Roberts v. Roberts (t)) a separate and individual portion of the annuity bequeathed to Thomas, but that he takes it as one of a class, and that his children intended by the testator to take after his decease, are persons forming part of a class, some of whom are precluded from taking, and consequently that the gift over after his decease is void."

Remarks on Greenwood v.
Roberts.

But Leake v. Robinson appears not to justify the use here made of the word "class." The grandchildren were not all of one class ; there were as many separate classes of grandchildren as there were children of Thomas, and although to save repetition the gifts to all these classes was included in one set of words, the gift to each of them was wholly independent of the gifts to the others, its amount having been finally ascertained at the death of Thomas, when the number of his children who survived him or predeceased him leaving issue was known. A number of persons are popularly said to form a class when they can be designated by some general name, as "children," "grandchildren," "nephews ;" but in legal language the question whether a gift is one to a class depends not upon these considerations, but upon the mode of gift itself, namely, that it is a gift of an aggregate sum to a body of persons uncertain in number at the time of the gift, to be ascertained at a future time, and who are all to take in equal or in some other definite proportions, the share of each being dependent for its amount upon the ultimate number of persons. Thus, a bequest of 1000*l.* to the children of A., the eldest child to take one moiety, the younger children the other moiety, is, in ordinary language, a gift to one class of persons, namely, children ; in the legal acceptance of the words it is a gift partly to an individual, namely, the eldest child of A., and partly to a class, namely, his younger children. On the other hand, a gift to A., B., and C., and the children of D., share and share alike, may, legally speaking, be a gift to a class (u), but yet these persons Trusts, 33 L. J. Ch. 183, it was admitted by Wood, V.-C., that naming some of a class did not make it less a class ; yet he held that the named person having died before the testator, his share lapsed ; which seems contradictory." As mentioned above (p. 334), the remarks in the text and the foregoing note are an addition by Mr. Jarman's editors (see the fourth edition of this work, by Mr. Vincent, p. 268). In Re Moss ([1899]

would not in the ordinary acceptation of the term form a class. Moreover, under a gift to a class, if any of the class take, they take the whole; the subject of gift can never, therefore, be partly disposed of and partly undisposed of; this shews that the grandchildren in Greenwood v. Roberts did not take as a class, for supposing the gift valid, the children of one child of Thomas would have taken part of the fund, while another part would have been undisposed of if another child of Thomas had no children (v).

The principle of Griffith v. Pownall prevailed in Cattlin v. Brown (w), where a testator entitled to the equity of redemption in lands, subject to a mortgage in fee, devised them to T. B. C. for life, with remainder to all and every his child and children during their natural lives if more than one; and after the decease of any or either of such child or children then the part or share of him, her or them so dying was given to his, her or their child or children lawfully begotten or to be begotten, and to his, her or their heirs as tenants in common. T. B. C. left several children, some born in the testator's lifetime, some after his death; and it was held by Sir W. P. Wood, V.-C., that the shares of the children born in the lifetime of the testator were well given to their children though the gift to the other grandchildren failed. He thought Greenwood v. Roberts was distinguishable because "the children of the brother who were born and in esse at the death of the testator, might all have been dead at the death of the brother, and the case, therefore, fell within the rule in Leake v. Robinson. It was a gift to a class, and all the members of the class might be persons without the limits. The children born at the testator's death might take no interest whatever. On this ground the decision in Greenwood v. Roberts was no doubt perfectly right." And he intimated that the case before him might have been similar if the devise had been to the sons of T. B. C. living at his decease, with remainder to their sons in fee.

2 Ch. at p. 317) they were attributed by Lindley, L. J., to Mr. Jarman. As to Drakeford v. Drakeford, see post, p. 435. The principle on which Re Chaplin's Trusts was decided is that a gift to a class is not the less a class gift because some members of that class are named: thus, a gift "to my son George and all sons of mine who may hereafter be born" is a good class gift. But a gift to a class and an individual who is not a member of that class, is not primâ facie a class gift, though it may have the same effect as a gift to a class if the testator expresses an intention to that effect (Kingsbury v.

Walter, [1901] A. C. 187). The question is discussed in Chap. XIII., in connection with the doctrine of lapse. The decision in Re Chaplin's Trusts was followed by Jessel, M. R., in Re Allen (or Re Atter), [1881] W. N. 6, 44 L. T. 240, 29 W. R. 480; and would apparently have been followed by Kay, J., in Re Featherstone's Trusts, 22 Ch. D. 111; and by Chitty, J., in Re Jackson, 25 Ch. D. 162, if the language of the wills had not been different. See also Re Mervin, [1891] 3 Ch. 197.

CHAPTER X.
Remarks thereon by Kindersley, V.-C.	Sir R. Kindersley said (x) he was unable to see the distinction here referred to: it appeared to him that in Cattlin v. Brown precisely the same observation would arise, and that it would be equally true that all the children of T. B. C. that were born and in esse at the death of the testator might die in the lifetime of T. B. C. He did not see how the observation or the ground of distinction applied; and it struck him that the same reason which was given in support of Greenwood v. Roberts would have required Cattlin v. Brown to be decided in the same way. It must also be observed
Explanation of Greenwood v. Roberts by Romilly, M.R.	that the M. R. himself declared (y) that the gift to grandchildren in the latter case would undoubtedly have been good if the class was to be ascertained at the death of Thomas; and he referred his decision to the clause which substituted the issue of any child of Thomas who should die before Thomas, in the place and to take the share of their parent, and to the fact that such issue took no vested interests until they attained twenty-one, so that if the children of Thomas who were living at the date of the will died before Thomas and left children who died under twenty-one leaving remoter issue, it would not be until these remoter issue attained twenty-one that the class would be ascertained, or the number of shares ascertained into which the fund would be divisible, and this would be too remote. This was a new ground. It was not taken in the case itself; doubtless because the substitution clause said nothing about the age of twenty-one. But if this clause is to be understood as so referring to the previous gift to grandchildren in remainder, as to import into itself the mention of that age, so also must it be deemed to import the declaration that the interests given were "vested." Besides, the intermediate interest was given for the benefit of the grandchildren during minority.
Remarks thereon.	The distinction already noticed as having been taken by Sir W. Wood regarding Greenwood v. Roberts, was disregarded by him in Wilson v. Wilson (z). The bequest there was of a sum of money upon trust to pay the income to the testator's wife during her life, and after her death in trust for the then present and future children of I. L. who should be living at the death of the testator's wife, and who should attain the age of twenty-one or marry, in equal shares; and the testator directed that the shares of each daughter should be settled upon trust for her for life, and after her death for her children. Sir W. Wood decided that the trust in favour of a child of a daughter who was living at the death of the testator was valid. He said, "I can conceive no ground why in respect of a child of I. L. in esse at the time of the testator's decease there should not be a direction that her share should be settled on her children. In Porter v Fox (a) and that class of cases the difficulty arises from there being a gift to a class of persons some of whom can take whilst others cannot. In these cases it cannot be ascertained what is the share of each, and hence the gift is held void as to all. Here, however, the children of each child of I. L. form a separate class, and the share of each class is separately ascertainable."

Cattlin v. Brown* was followed by Sir R. Kindersley in Knapping v. Tomlinson (b), where the devise was identical in its terms with that in the former case. The V.-C. reviewed all the cases, and expressed his entire concurrence with Sir W. Wood's decision, Sir J. Romilly having also declared (c) his approval of that decision, and having referred his own decision in Greenwood v. Roberts to grounds which at all events remove it from apparent opposition to the other authorities (d), it must be taken as settled that where the shares of all the separate stocks can be ascertained within legal limits, as in those authorities, the rule in Leake v. Robinson is not applicable so as to defeat limitations, otherwise valid, of the separate shares.

Knapping v. Tomlinson, in part only.

Accordingly, in Re Russell (e), where a testator gave his residuary estate in trust after the death of M. and her husband, for all the daughters of M. who should attain twenty-one or marry under that age, with a proviso that the share of any daughter should be held upon trust for her for life, and after her death upon similar trusts for her children as were thereinbefore provided for the children of M.: it was held that the proviso for settlement of the shares was applicable to each share separately, and that although it would have been void for remoteness in the case of daughters of M. born after the testator, it was valid in the case of daughters born in his lifetime.

Re Russell.

"Where the testator has combined with the remote class a living person, in such a manner as to constitute him a member of the class, the gift to him cannot be distinguished from, and therefore shares the fate of, the gift to the other intended objects, with which it stands blended and associated" (f). This conclusion was questioned by a learned judge (g), who thought the gift to the living person, when associated with a gift to a "class" (all to take as tenants in common), ought not to fail any more than it would if it had been associated with a gift to other named individuals to take with him as tenants in common. But the conclusion seems inevitable: for in the former case the share of the living person could not be ascertained but by reference to the number of members ultimately included in the class; and this could not be known within due limits. This it was that made the living person one of the class, subject to all the conditions that appertained to that character. Leake v. Robinson shows that it is not the description of the legatees as children or grandchildren that constitutes them a class, but the mode and conditions of the gift. Sir W. Grant there observed (h) that, supposing the distinction made (as was there attempted) between persons capable and persons incapable, there was still the difficulty of adjusting the proportions in which the capable children were to take, and in determining the manner and the period of ascertaining those proportions (i).

Whether the result would be the same if the gift were in joint tenancy, does not seem to have been decided. In the third edition of this work (by Messrs. Wolstenholme and Vincent) (j) the opinion was expressed that in such a case "the result would have been in accordance with the learned judge's [Stuart, V.-C.] dictum: because the gift, so far as it was to others than the individual, being void, the whole fund would accrue to the individual."

As to provisions for grandchildren.

Mr. Jarman remarks (k) that "a testator is in less danger of transgressing the perpetuity rule, whilst providing for his own children and grandchildren, than when the objects of his bounty are the children and grandchildren of another; since, in the former case, he has only to avoid protracting the vesting of the grandchildren's shares beyond their ages of twenty-one years, and then the fact of the gift extending to after-born grandchildren would not

(j) P. 252. Mr. Vincent seems subsequently to have entertained some doubt on the point, for in the fourth edition the passage above quoted is omitted, and there is substituted (in a footnote) the question: "If the gift were in joint tenancy, would the whole fund accrue to the individual?" The present editor shares this doubt.

invalidate it, because all the children of the testator must be in esse at his decease, and their children must be born in their lifetime, so that they necessarily come into existence during a life in being. On the other hand, a gift embracing the whole range of the unborn grandchildren of another living person would be clearly void, though the shares should be made to vest at majority or even at birth, for the grandfather might have children born after the testator's decease, and as the gift would extend to the children of such after-born children, it would be absolutely void for remoteness, and that, too, according to the principle already laid down, without regard to the fact of there being any such child or not."

"It is clear," as Mr. Jarman also remarks (kk), "that, in order to render a gift to a class of persons valid, the Court will not depart from the established rule of construction, which fixes its range of objects; for though it is probable that the testator, if interrogated on the point, would have consented to restrict the class for the purpose of bringing it within due limits, yet, as the will intimates no such intention, its judicial expositor is not warranted in so dealing with its contents.

Rules of construction not to be strained to render gift valid.

"As in Jee v. Audley (l), where a testator bequeathed 1000*l.* to be placed out at interest, which interest he gave to his wife during her life; and at her death he gave the 1000*l.* to his niece Mary Hall, and the issue of her body lawfully begotten and to be begotten; and in default of such issue, he gave it to be equally divided between the daughters then living of John Jee and Elizabeth Jee his wife. It was objected that the limitation to the daughters of John and Elizabeth Jee was void, as being too remote, being to take effect on a general failure of issue of Mary Hall, and was not confined to the daughters living at the death of the testator. On the other side, it was said that, though the late cases had decided that, on a gift to children generally, such children as should be living at the time of the distribution of the fund would be let in, yet it would be very hard to adhere to such a rule of construction so rigidly as to defeat the evident intention of the testator in this case, especially as there was no real possibility of J. and E. Jee having children after the testator's death, they being then seventy years old; and in determining whether or not a gift was void for remoteness. But the V.-C.'s decision in that case, so far as regards this point, is contrary both to principle and to the current of authority, and not to be relied upon. See Re Dawson, 39 Ch. D. at p. 163.

CHAPTER X.

if there were two ways of construing words, that should be adopted which would give effect to the disposition made by the testator; that the cases which had decided that after-born children should take, proceeded on the implied intention of the testator, and never meant to give effect to words which would totally defeat such intention. But Sir Lloyd Keynon, M. R., observed that it had been decided by several cases, that, in bequests to children, all those born before the interest vested in possession were entitled." It followed that the limitation in the will was void in its creation, and he declined to vary this construction, or to assume that John and Elizabeth would not have any more children, in order to give validity to the limitation.

Gift to unborn person answering a particular description.

(F) GIFTS TO CONTINGENT PERSONS—LIMITATIONS TO A SERIES.—

As Mr. Jarman points out (m), "The doctrine that the validity of a gift is to be tried by possible, not actual events, is, of course, applicable no less to gifts to individuals than to gifts to classes. If, therefore, the devise or bequest be in favour of an unborn person, who may not answer the required description within a life and twenty-one years, it will be void, although a person should happen to answer the description within such period. Thus, if a testator give real or personal estate to an unborn person, who shall thereafter happen to acquire some personal qualification, which is attainable at any period of life, and is not necessarily confined to minority, as in the case of a gift to the first son of A. who shall obtain a commission in the Army, take a degree at the university, or marry, it is conceived that the gift would be void, even though A. should happen to have a son who should answer the required qualification before the age of twenty-one."

Thus, in Proctor v. Bishop of Bath and Wells (n), there was a devise in fee to the first or other son of A. that should be bred a clergyman and be in holy orders, but in case A. should have no such son. then to B. in fee. A. died without ever having had a son, and it was held that the gift to B. was void.

So in Ibbetson v. Ibbetson (o), the testator bequeathed chattels to the first tenant in tail of the age of twenty-one years, who should be in possession of a certain mansion house: as there might be successive tenancies in tail without any tenant in tail attaining twenty-one, the bequest might remain suspended for an indefinite number of years, and was, therefore, void for remoteness.

(o) 10 Sim. 495, 5 My. & C. 26. Other

Ker v. Lord Dungannon (p), Lord Dungannon v. Smith (q), and Wainman v. Field (r), were decided on the same principle. CHAPTER X.

Questions of this kind frequently arise where property is attempted to be limited to a series of persons answering a certain description. In such cases, as Mr. Jarman remarks (s), "there is no principle of law preventing a testator from so framing and moulding his disposition, as to make its validity depend on subsequent events; or, in other words, from availing himself of the course of circumstances posterior to the making of his will, in order to get as wide a range of postponement as possible; for instance, he may convert the intended estate tail of a person then unborn, into an estate for life, in case of his happening to come in esse in his (the testator's) lifetime. In all cases of failure under circumstances of this nature, the deficiency is one not of power but of expression; and the question in every instance is, whether the testator had clearly shewn an intention to take the most ample range or period of postponement, which subsequent circumstances admit of. A point of this kind was much canvassed under the will of Lord Vere (t), who bequeathed to trustees all his household goods, furniture, pictures, books, linen, &c., upon trust to permit his wife to have the use of them during her life, and, upon her death, to permit his son A. B. to have the use of the same goods, &c., for his life, and, upon the decease of the
